Darby, Rev. John Nelson, 1800-1882, b. in London; graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1819; was admitted to the bar in 1825, and afterwards took orders and held a curacy in the Anglican Church, but resigned his charge in 1827 to join a new sect called "the Brethren," afterwards known as the "Plymouth Brethren," from the association of many of their number with Plymouth, where they had a meeting house. In 1838 he went to Switzerland, and established congregations in the cantons of Vaud, Geneva, and Berne, some of which suffered persecution in 1845 in a revolu-tion aroused by Jesuit intrigues. Darby escaped and returned to Plymouth. He had already been accused of departing from the first principles of "the Brethren," and after his return a division took place, and he founded a new association, known as "the Darbyites." He paid several visits to Canada and to the United States, and also visited New Zealand and the West Indies. His writings were published partly under his own name, partly anonymously or under his initials. He made French and German translations of the New Testament, and wrote a number of hymns. The list of his publications includes the following: 1. Notes on the Gospel of John, from Notes of Lectures. 2. New Opinions of the John, from Notes of Lectures. 2. New Opinions of the Brethren examined by a Spectator, Lon., n. d., 12mo. 3. Notes on Revelation, 1839, fp. Svo. 4. Newton's Apocalypse examined, 1848, 12mo. 5. Darwin, Charles Robert, F.R.S., F.G.S., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1809–1882, b. at "The Mount," Shrewsbury, Eng., son of Robert Waring Darwin, M.D., F.R.S., and of Susanna, daughter of Josiah Wedgwood, and grandson of Erasmus Darwin, (q. v., ante, vol. i.) After studying at Shrewsbury Grannmar-School, he entered studying at Shrewsbury Grammar-School, he entered Edinburgh University in 1825, with a view to adopting his father's profession; but the study of medicine proving distasteful to him, he abandoned it after two years, and entered Christ's College, Cambridge, with the design of fitting himself for the church. The influence of Professor Henslow, whose lectures he attended, aroused an interest in science which soon became dominant, and shortly after taking his B.A. degree, in 1831, he was engaged as naturalist to the "Beagle," then starting under Captain—afterwards Admiral—Fitzroy to complete the survey of Patagonia begun by Captain King in 1826—30, and to make further surveys in South America and the Pacific. In 1836 he returned to England, and was occu-

in the lives of the men and women of the past."—Ath., No. 1888, Songs, Ballads, and a Garden Play, Lon., 1888, married his cousin, Emma Wedgwood, and in 1842 settled at Down, Kent, where he spent the remainder of his life, engaged in researches and experiments designed to test and establish the theory of evolution which has become identified with his name. His study of the South American fossils had first led him to doubt the commonlyreceived view of the different species of animals and plants as distinct and immutable types, the product of direct and successive acts of creation. But before seeking to displace this doctrine by that of a slow and continuous development through regular and ordinary processes of nature, he desired to trace so far as possible the whole course of derivation, and to illustrate his argument by an abundance of minute details. He accordingly looked forward to the production of a single elaborate work, covering the whole field of his argument. But, finding that he was about to be anticipated by Mr. Alfred Wallace, who had arrived independently at the same general conclusions, he first drew up a paper, which was read, with that of Wallace, at a meeting of the Linnsean Society, July 1, 1858, and then set to work to prepare an "abstract" of his theory, which grew into a volume, and was published in November, 1859. This was The Origin of Species, which excited a discussion that partook of the character of a theological controversy. The adverse criticism was, however, much more sweeping and vehement than the defence. Men of science were not generally prepared to accept the new theory in its entirety, and those most favorably disposed to it either shrunk from the open expression of their approval or were content to claim for it a respectful hearing and to deprecate the notion of its destructive influence on religious belief. Yet there could be little doubt as to the general drift of scientific opinions. In March, 1860, Darwin drew up a classified list of his adherents, including among geologists Lyell and Ramsay, among zoologists Huxley and Lubbock, among botanists Hooker and Asa Gray, (to some extent,) among physiologists Dr. W. B. Carpenter, and (to a large extent) Sir Henry Holland. He added that should the book be forgotten "with such a list, I am convinced the subject will not." Darwin's subsequent works may be regarded as amplifications of different sections of The Origin of Species. The Descent of Man presented the most unpalatable portions of the doc-trine, but the shock was less than had been anticipated, the attitude of the public towards evolution having considerably changed in the years between 1859 and 1871. In the interval that has since elapsed the theory of evolution has been subjected to more careful criticism in regard to details, but in the main it has formed the basis of all recent scientific investigation. During his later years Darwin devoted himself chiefly to the study of plants and to works embodying the results of extensive experimental researches. He led a quiet, secluded life, partly on account of chronic ill health, and his absorption in his work was such that he appears to have sacrificed to it not only extraneous interests and occupations, but to some extent his natural tastes, his sense of religion, his love of literature and of art. He was distinion, his love of literature and of art. He was distinguished by his modesty, his simplicity of mind, and his kindness and helpfulness to younger naturalists. He died at Down on April 19, 1882, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. For biog., see Darwin, Francis, infra; also, Allen, C. B. G., and Bettany, G. T., supra, and a volume of Memorial Notices, by T. H. Huxley, J. G. Romanes, A. Geikie, and W. T. T. Dyer, issued in 1882. The literature of "Darwinism" would form a library in itself, including works in many foreign languages. in itself, including works in many foreign languages, especially German, the influence of evolution on the general tone of philosophical thought and investigation seeming to have been greater in Germany than in any other country. The following list of Darwin's works, additional to the few mentioned ante, vol. i., does not include his contributions to scientific journals, unless reprinted, which are enumerated in the biography by his son. The critical extracts give, necessarily, only a meagre idea of the controversy that followed the publication of his principal works, the articles from which thay are derived being mainty compiled with a discovery they are derived being mainly occupied with a discussion of details. 1. "The essay is full of Mr. Darwin's characteristic excellences. It is a most readable book: full of facts in natural history, old and new, of his collecting and observing; and all of these are told in his own perspicuous language, and all thrown into picturesque combinations, and all sparkle with the colours of fancy and the lights of imagination. It assumes, too, the grave proportions of a sustained argument upon a matter of the deepest interest, not to naturalists alone, or even to men of science exclusively, but to every one who is interested in the history of man and of the relations of nature around him to the history and plan of creation. . . On what, then, is the new theory based? We say it with unfeigned regret in dealing with such a man as Mr. Darwin, on the merest hypotheses, supported by the most unbounded assumptions. "Quarterly Review, 108, 25 et seq. (This article was by Bishop Wilberforce.)

"Darwin's theory is an ingenious and plausible speculation, to which future physiologists will look back with the kind of admiration we bestow on the atoms of Lucretius or the crystal spheres of Eudoxus, containing, like these, some faint half-truth, marking at once the ignorance of the age and the ability of the philosopher."—North Brutish Review, XIvi. 171.

"It is a book—we say it deliberately—that will not bear to be dealt with lightly. It is the result of long-continued thought and labour, directed by a man of remarkable ability and wide attainments, to construct and consolidate a theory which has for its basis some undeniable facts. There is scarcely an objection that can be urged that Mr. Darwin has not already anticipated, and to wnich he has not replied, so far as it admits of reply,—and that with a degree of moderation and candour that would be evidences of excellent judgment if they were not, as we believe them a vacuum. He is as greedy of cases and precedents as any constitutional lawyer, and all the principles he lays down are capable of being brought to the test of observation and experiment. The path he bids us follow professes to be not a mere arry track, fibricated of ideal cobwebs, but a solid and broad bridge of facts. If it be so, it will carry us safely over many a chasm in our knowledge, and lead us to a region free from the snares of those fascinating but barren virgins, the Final Causes, against whom a high authority has so justly warned us "—T. If II(xLFY) article in the Times of December 26, 1859, quoted in the Life of Darwin, Amer ed. If 49.

"We are disposed to rank the derivative hypothesis in its fulness with the nebular hypothesis, and to regard both as allowable, as not unlikely to prove temble in spite of some strong objections, but as not therefore demonstrably true. Those, if any there be, who regard the derivative hypothesis as satisfactorily proved, must have loose notions as to what proof is. Those who imagine it can be easily refuted and cast aside must, we think, have very imperfect or very prejudiced conceptions of the facts conceined and of the questions at issue "—Asy GRAY: Downwing, 135. (The article from which the extract is taken is one of three originally published in the Manthy for July, August, and October, 1830, and reprinted, at Darwin's request, in London, in 1861)

"Never, perhaps, in the history of philosophy, have such wide generalizations been derived from such a small basis of fact. Mr. Darwin's theory of the growth of the moral sense and of the intellectual faculty is unsupported by any proof; and the very corner-stone of the hypothesis, that the human mind is identical in kind with that of the brutes, is a mere assumption, opposed alike to experience and philosophy."—Edin. Rev., cxxxiv. 99.

"The effect of Mr. Darwin's long-expected and lately-published volames will not be so much to startle friend or loe by novel facts or transcendent theories as to consolidate, to fortify, and to push to a conclusion the scheme of ideas which the world has learned for years to associate with his name. . His conclusions now go the length which he had, in terms somewhat vague and tentative, set himself at the outset of his speculations. He claims to have brought man himself, his origin and constitution, within that unity which he had previously sought to trace through all lower animal forms. The growth of opinion in the interval, due in chief measure to his own intermediate works, has placed the discussion of this problem very much in advance of that held by it fifteen years ago, . Mr. Darwin's object in the present work is to establish, from a general survey of his whole nature, the evidences of 'man, like every other species, being descended from some pre existing form; secondly, the manner of his development; and, thirdly, the value of the differences between the so-called races of man." . The intellectual pleasure of following so exquisite a chain of philosophical deduction may almost compensate many minds for the shock which his ultimate conclusion will inflict on them."—Sat. General Criticism:

"In respect of the great problems of Philosophy, the post-Darwinian generation is, in one sense, exactly where the præ-Darwinian generations were. They remain insoluble. But the present generation has the advantage of being better provided with the means of freeing itself from the tyrauny of certain sham solutions. The known is finite, the unknown infinite; intellectually we stand on an islet in the midst of an illimitable ocean of inexplicability. Our business in every generation is to reclaim a little more land, to add something to the extent and solidity of our possessions. And even a cursory glance at the history of the biological sciences during the last quarter of a century is sufficient to justify the assertion that the most potent instrument for the extension of the realm of natural knowledge which has come into men's hands, since the publication of Newton's 'Principia,' is Darwin's 'Origin of Species.'"—T. H. HUXLEY: On the Reception of the "Origin of Species." "—T. H. HUXLEY: On the Reception of the "Origin of Species." "—T. H. HUXLEY: On the Reception of the continuous publication of the fittest, and heredity—were all previously well-known facts; and we may not unreasonably feel astonished that so apparently obvious a combination of them as that which occurred to Mr. Darwin should have occurred to no one else, with the single exception of Mr. Wallace. . . But the greatness of Mr. Darwin should have occurred to hade on natural selection: his claim to everlasting memory rests upon the many years of devoted labour whereby he tested this idea in all conceivable ways.—amassing facts from every department of science, balancing evidence with the soundest judgment, shirking no difficulty, and at last astonishing the world as with a revelation by publishing the completed proof of evolution."—Nature, xxvi. 99.

"Those who have watched the progress of science within the last ton years will bear me out to the ful assert that there is no field of biological inquiry in which the influence of the 'Origin of Species' is not traceable; the foremost men of science are either avowed champions of its leading doctrines, or at any rate abstain from opposing them; a host of young and ardent investigators seek for and find inspiration and guidance in Mr. Darwin's great work; and the general doctrine of Evolution, to one side of which it gives expression finds in the phenomena of biology a firm base of operations whence it may conduct its conquest of the whole realm of nature. History warns us, however, that it is the customary fate of new truths to begin as heresies and to end as superstitions; and, as matters now stand, it is hardly rash to anticipate that in another twenty years the new generation, educated under the influences of the present day, will be in danger of accepting the main doctrines of the 'Origin of Species' with as little reflection, and, it may be, with as little lustification, as so many of our contemporaries, twenty years ago, rejected them."—T. H. HUXLEY: Nature, xxii. I. "Darwinian teleology has the special advantage of accounting for the imperfections and failures as well as for successes. It not only accounts for them, but turns them to practical account. It explains the seeming waste as being part and parcel of a great economical process. Without this, no natural selection and survival of the fittest, no continuous adaptation to changing surroundings, no diversification and improvement, leading from lower up to higher and nobler forms. So the most puzzling frings of all to the old-school teleologists are the principial of the Darwinian."—Asa Gray: Darwiniana, 378.

"Mr. Darwin's investigation presents us with a creative force, constantly, and apparently to human eyes tentatively forms of every kind which it has brought into existence, with a view, as it were, to see whether any of them will have the advantage over others,—creating very high forms of intellectual instinct at the very threshold of the world dom, conscience, the power to sin. Is this in any sense whatever, even conceivably, an atheistic philosophy?... For our own part, we find Mr. Darwin's investigation of the origin of man a far more wonderful vindication of Theism than Paley's 'Natural Theology.'"—Spectator, xliv.

"If Dr. Dasent had been willing to translate the 'Jomsvikinga Saga' in the same straightforward way in which, years ago, he translated 'Njála,' he would, we think, have conferred a greater favour on the reading public than he has done in diluting it into a modern three-volume novel."

"For all who are interested in the manners and customs of Scandinavia in early times 'The Vikings of the Baltic' will be invaluable."—G. W. Gosse: Acad., vii, 523.

"The book Mr. Davis has written is not the book which real students of history would have asked him to write. They would like to have him tell the things which he knows better than other men, and of which his personal reminiscences will be original and valuable evidence... Mr. Davis in his two bulky volumes throws hardly a single ray of light upon the real secrets of the great conflict."—Nation, xxxii. 10 readers and weary others. Those who turn to his volumes for revelations will find that he has little that is new to tell. for revelations will find that he has little that is new to tell, while those who hope to get from him a concise and clear view of the organization of which he was the soul and the chief will be repelled by the vast amount of dissertation with which he cumbers his pages . His work may not vindicate him from the charge of blundering or folly; it will not raise him in the opinion of his fellow-citizens in the North; but every impartial reader must recognize the ability with which it is composed, the sincerity with which his opinions are held and the good faith with which they are set forth, and the value which it possesses as the authentic commentary on the most momentous episode in the history of the United States,"—Ath., No. 2799.

"The work of Mr. Jefferson Davis will disappoint some readors and weary others. Those who turn to his volumes.

Davis, Mrs. Rebecca Harding, b. 1831, at Washington, Pa.; passed much of her early life in West Virginia: began while quite young to write for periodicals, and in 1861 the Atlantic Monthly brought out her story, Life in the Iron-Mills, which attracted much notice and made a deep impression. In 1863 she was married to L. Clarke Davis, supra. Since 1869 she has been an editorial writer on the staff of the New York Tribune. She has written largely for the daily press, and is a frequent contributor of short stories, sketches, and articles to leading periodicals. 1. Margaret Howth, 1861. 2. Waiting for the Verdict, N. "Mrs. Davis's stories are habitually spoken of as 'earnest' works. . Their pretensions are something very different from those of the simple novel of entertainment, of character, and of incident. The writer takes life des of character, and of incident. The writer takes life desperately hard, and looks upon the world with a sentimental—we may even say, a tearful—eye. The other novel—the objective novel, as we may call it for convenience—appeals to the reader's sense of beauty, his idea of form and proportion, his humanity in the broadest sense. Mrs. Davis's tales and those of her school appeal, we may say, to the conscience to the sense of right and wrong, to the instincts of charity and putronage. She aims at instructing us, purifying us, stirring up our pity. Writers of the other school content themselves with exciting our curiosity."—Nation, vii. 330.

Dawkins, William Boyd, F.R.S., F.G.S., 1838, at Welshpool, Montgomeryshire, Wales; was educated at Jesus College, Oxford, where he was the first holder of a geological scholarship founded by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and graduated 1860. He was appointed geologist to the Gological Survey of Great Britain in 1867, and in 1874 became professor of geology in Owens College, Manchester. In 1882 he was one of the committee of scientific men appointed to inquire into the scheme of the Channel Tunnel, and was intrusted with the geological survey of the French and English coasts. He has contributed numerous papers to the Proceedings of the Geological, Anthropological, and Royal Societies, relating chiefly to fossil mammalia, and is best known by his researches on the remains discovered in caves in the south of France. He visited the United States in 1880, and lectured before the Lowell Institute in Boston. 1. Cave-Hunting: Researches on the Evidences of Caves respecting the Early Inhabitants of Europe. Illustrated by Coloured Plates and Wood-Cuts.

"Mr. Dawkins divides his subject under two heads, Physical and Biological: the first treating of the relation of caves to general physical geography, especially to that of the calcareous strata; the second, of their animal contents."—Ath., No. 2458.

"No one has gone more thoroughly than Professor Dawkins into the evidence as to the succession of animal life in England since the Miocene period, and the bearing of this evidence on the antiquity of man. . . . He is less disposed than most cave-hunters to worship their special 'idols of the cave.' But when he comes out into the open, and takes to looking ethnologically at the people of the land, he is somewhat apt to set up 'idols of the tribe' and pay them reverence."—Speciator, xivii. 1568.

2. Early Man in Britain, and his Place in the Tertiary Period. Illust. Lon., 1880, 8vo.

"Professor Boyd Dawkins has sought to bring to a common focus the rays of light shed upon the primæval stage of human life by the sciences of geology, prehistoric archaelogy, and history. . . . With the materials thus accumulated the archæologist may claim to have established, as our author does in his preliminary remarks, a tolerably complete sequence of events from the remote past in which man stands in the geological foreground down to the borders of written history."—Sal. Ren., xllx. 827.

"The weight of learning in its pages is by no means oppressive, since it is relieved by a pleasant style of writing, not common, it is sad to say, in works on solid science."—Ath., No. 2739.

"It is the object of Sir W. Dawson's book to exhibit the culture of the native American as it existed in præ Columbian days, and by means of it to throw light upon the habits and institutions of Palæolithic man, as he lived in Hoxne or the valleys of the Somme. . . . He lays down as an established starting-point the Hebrew tradition of our first parents, applies to it the Usherian chronology of B.C. 4000, cites Tubal-Cain as the pioneer of the Iron Age, Jubal of the nomadic life, sees in Adam a Turanian man, in the big tenants of the Cro-mageron cave the giants of Genesis. . . We had thought that the school of Reconcilists was extinct, but, living in a land of survivals, Sir W. Dawson has galvanized it into unexpected life "—Spectator, lix. 1276.

His plots are always interesting, and the reader is carried on to the end of the book in a pleasing the reader is carried on to the end of the book in a pleasing uncertainty between a profound conviction of a happy issue and alarm at the dangers that encompass the tortured hero and heroine. His characters are sharply and humorously drawn, and, if they often lack those higher qualities that make people interesting in stories and in real life, they have certainly the merit of distinctness. They make an impression as of people whom we have seen. They stand out well. The scenes, too, that he represents are put before us with considerable dramatic vigor. His style is never dull, and the little side remarks . . . are often quite amusing."—Nation, xiv. 189.

De Lancey, Edward Floyd, b. 1821, at Mamaroneck, N.Y., son of William Heathcote De Lancey, Bishop of Western New York, (q. v., ante, vol. i.,) was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, and at Hobart College; studied law at the Harvard Law School; was admitted to the bar in 1846, and has since resided and practised in New York City. "The author was a native of Queen's County, connected with the aristocracy of the colony, and one of the judges of the supreme court of the province just before and during the war. . . . Coming as an heirloom into the possession of the late Bishop De Lancey, the manuscript was left by him to his son, under whose conscientions care it is now edited. . . . Our author's simple rule disregards lineage; his censure is all for liberals, his praise all for tories; nor does station silence his reviling, nor sex check his insinuations. . . . The pains and research bestowed upon the notes, making them far the most interesting part of the publication, deserve hearty praise."—Nation, xxviii, 420.

2. John Ward, Preacher, Bost., 1888, 12mo.

"In 'John Ward, Preacher, the author has given a picture of that rara avis, a logical Calvinist. . . John Ward's concerns, however, are not the only, perhaps not the main, interest of the book. The village of Ashurst supplies some charming scenes of country life, drawn with the tender grace and quaintness in which he poet of 'The Old Garden' dipped an earlier pen. . . About the village spinsters and the elderly village bachelor, and the loves and rivalries and incompleted lives of Ashurst, hangs an old-time fragrance, as of a grandmother's rose-jar; but only a modern novelist (or a Greek poet) could have stated and left unsolved so many questions touching on tragedy."—Nation, xlvi. 530. -Nation, xlvi. 580.

"There is a wonderful harmony in the book. The tide of Carnival flows ceaselessly through it, with the booming music, the swift, fantastic, whirling rush, of the opening chapter. Images press, associations swarm, sounds are tumultuous, there are dash and glitter everywhere, and one is fairly smothered in flowers and synonymes, bewildered by the strange mixture of good and bad taste, of keen delicate definition of beauty and vulgar daubing, the piling-up of epithets, the attractiveness of some and the repulsiveness of other sentiments, the invetentely false art which first describes a beautiful object beautifully and then snofis the effect by likening it to something else." then spoils the effect by likening it to something else.' "Ouida's new story is perhaps the best of her many and meritorious works. It is in one volume, which is much, and the style is comparatively subdued... The virtue of her amazingly virtuous peasants is kept in the background, her scenery is less lush, less overgrown with violets, maidenhair, rhododendrons, and so on, than usual, and, in short, her style is decidedly chastened. Unfortunately, her theme is not so very chaste."-A. Lang: Acad., ix 428

"The book now to be considered makes her genius apparent in the powerful and pathetic story which she tells of an Italian girl, possessed of great beauty and a strength that is marvellous, who takes up her abode alone in an of Etruscan tomb, on a wild moorland; here she subsists almost entirely upon roots, berries, and bread which she makes for herself out of wild outs, exists in a Robinson-Crusoe-like sort of fashion, and has strange adventures. Her character, way of life, and herenlean strength appear all pretty equally improbable; but the reader is too much interested to take exception to that, and it no more interferes with his enjoyment than the knowledge of the non-cxistence of fairles, gnomes, and elves spoils the pleasure of a child deep in some of Hans Andersen's creations."—

"Mr. De Morgan's 'paradoxers' are people who propound notions which deviate more or less widely from the accepted notions on any subject. Every one comes across such an inventor occasionally, but few people are aware how very large a class these rational monomaniaes form. It was a happy thought to put them together, and thus enable those who have been puzzled by one or two discoverers to see how they look in the lump. The result is a book of which to say that it is full of the most curious oddities, most amazingly told is to eve a seant description of it. most amusingly told, is to give a scant description of it. It is one of those rare books in which wit, learning, and scholarship are blended into a charming medley, each page containing a new surprise."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 638.

"This is one of the books which stir up the wrath of the historian. . . . A fragment of history, however short, with the evidence for it, is something. A genuine local tradition, true or false, is also something. An avowedly ficultious story, well told, is also something in a third way.

All three are good things in their several places. But Mr. Dendy gives us an unpleasant mixture of the three."—Sat. Rev., xv. 831.

"Every person who lived among the wits of the first third of the present century took notes. . . . All Lady Chatterton's notes of this sort are favourable, and we gather thence that she was at home in society, and that a great many men of wit and parts found her society agreeable. We receive, in fact, an impression quite the opposite of what remains on the reader after a course of Miss Martineau."—Std. Rev., xiv. 835.

"His true place in Hebrew scholarship was to have been decisively established by a great work, never completed, on the Talmud, of which the 'Quarterly' article was but the foretaste; but his lecture on 'Semitic Palæography,' 1866, his writings on Pheentician inscriptions, the Moabite Stone, &c., demonstrate an epigraphist of a high order, and his numerous articles on Semitic subjects in the 'Saturday Review,' 'Athenaum,' and other journals, reveal extensive reading and wide grasp of Oriental history and philosophy. In whatever he wrote his vividly poetic nature asserted itself; his prose is the prose of a poet and musician."—STANLEY LANE-POOLE: Dict. of Nat. Biog., xiv. 423.

De Vere, Aubrey Thomas, [ante, vol. iii., VERE, AUBREY DE, add.] third son of Sir Aubrey de Vere, (ante, vol. i..) b. 1814, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He has written largely upon Irish themes. About 1851 he became a Roman Catholie. He was an intimate friend, as well as a connection by marriage, of Sir Henry Taylor. The following list of his works is believed to be complete. Some of those which are mentioned ante, vol. in, and under the name of his father, ante, vol. i., are there erroneously ascribed to the latter,

"If one tithe of the statements contained in this volume are true. Lady Lytton was for years the victim of cruel and persistent persecution. Many of the details must be regarded as proved beyond dispute. As a wife she was deeply wronged; but even the bitterest provocation will not suffice to excuse the course of conduct which she pursued.... In her vindication of her heroine Miss Devey has overshot the mark. She relies implicitly on Lady Lytton's own evidence, as given in her diaries, letters, or an autobiographica and unpublished MS. called 'Nemesis.' No impartial person can fail to see that much of this evidence is extremely high-coloured."—4th. No 3108, "Judiciously written, and of sustained interest."—Acad., xxxi. 354.

"We are disposed to hink that even those who disagree with the conclusions of this book will coneur in conceding its extraordinary lucidity, force, and dispassionateness. . . Mr. Dicey presents both the arguments of his opponents and his own arguments without a trace of political contents.

ical passion. There is not a word in the book which the strongest Home-ruler could regard as unfair, or contemptuous, or perverse. Often the Home-rulers' view is expounded with a force far greater than that with which their own organs have presented it, though Professor Dicey their own organs have presented it, though Professor Dicey weighs argument against argument and finds an immense balance of weight in the opposite scale. . . The great strength of his book consists in its analysis and discussion of the various forms of Home-rule."—Spectator, lix, 1557. "He speaks as a strong advocate who feels he has a strong case. Dickens, Charles, [ante, vol. i, add.,] 1812-1870, "entered in the baptismal register of Portsea as Charles John Huffham, though on the very rare occasions when he subscribed that name he wrote Huffam.") In the year 1858, to which the latest entries in vol. i. belong, Dickens began the course of public readings from his works, which was continued at intervals, during the twelve remaining years of his life, in London and the provinces, and in 1867-68 in many of the principal towns of the United States. In the same year he separated from his wife, and took steps for severing his connection with Household Words, which in the following year was discontinued, and followed by the establishment of All the Year Round. In 1860 he sold his residence in London, "Tavistock House," and established his permanent residence at Gadshill. His incessant labors and multifarious activity are supposed to have hastened his death, which occurred very suddenly, though not without pre-monitory symptoms throughout all his late years. His popularity as a writer seems to have suffered no diminution, at least in the twelve years succeeding his death, during which period the sale of his works in England amounted to 4,239,000 volumes. The following list includes the books mentioned ante, vol. i., where very few dates are appended. "It would, of course, be against all experience to suppose that to future generations Dickens, as a writer, will be all that he was to his own. Much that constitutes the subject, or at least furnishes the background, of his pictures of English life, . . . has vanished, or is being improved off the face of the land. The form, again, of Dickens's principal works may become obsolete, as it was in a sense accidental. He was the most popular novelist of his day; but should prose fiction, or even the full and florid species of it which has enjoyed so long-lived a favour, ever be out of season, the popularity of Dickens's books must experience an inevitable diminution. . . . Nature, when she gifted Dickens with sensibility, observation, and imagination, had bestowed upon him yet another boon in the quality which seems more prominent than any other in his whole being. The vigour of Dickens—a mental and moral vigour supported by a splendid physical organism—was the parent of some of his folbles; amongst the rest, of his tendency to exaggeration. . . But without this vigour he could not have been creative as he was; and in him there were accordingly united with rare completeness a swift responsiveness to the impulses of humour and pathos, an inexhaustible fertility in discovering and inventing materials for their excreise, and the constant creative desire to give to these newly-created materials a vivid plastic form."—A. D. Ward: Dickens, (English Men of Letters,) 194, 202.

Dickens, Charles, eldest son of the novelist, b. 1837; editor of All the Year Round and of Household Words; has issued a series of hand-books under the title of Diokens's Dictionary of London, Paris, the Thames, the University of Cambridge, and the University of Oxford, Lon., 1879 et seq. (Ed.) The Life of Charles James Mathews: chiefly Autobiographical: with Selections from his Correspondence and Speeches, Lon., 1879,

"All that is strange, diversified, alluring, and uncomfortable in the life of an actor is illustrated in the career of Charles Mathews. . . Mr. Dickens has discharged competently and gracefully his task of editor. So little obtrusion of self is there, it is only in the short prefatory explanation that we hear of him or recognize his existence. . . The papers with which he deals had been arranged by Mathews himself."—Ath., No. 2697.

"It is full of anecdotes, nearly all of them fresh and well told. Mathews's frequent letters are as light and sprightly as possible."—Nation, xxix. 246.

8th ed., with additional chapters on English Influence in Japan and China, &c., 1885, I vol. p. 8vo.

"The defects of Mr. Dilke's work are a certain excess of statement, a considerable crudity of opinion as to the principles which govern the formation of societies, some of the pedantry of travel, and somewhat too much readiness to believe in the grandeur of England because you meet English squatters in Australia and English-speaking barbarians in Nevada or Colorado. Its merits are that it is written in a lively and agreeable style, that it implies a great deal of physical pluck, that no page of it fails to show an acute and highly intelligent observer, that it stimulates the imagination as well as the judgment of the reader, and that it is on perhaps the most interesting subject that can attract an Englishman who cares about his country."—Sat. Disracti, Benjamin, Earl of Beaconsfield, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1804-1881. In February, 1858, Mr. Disraeli became chancellor of the exchequer for the second time, resigning with the rest of the ministry in June, 1859, and remaining in opposition till July, 1866, when the third Derby administration was formed, Disraeli again becoming chancellor of the exchequer, and in February, 1868, succeeding Lord Derby as premier. On the defeat of the government in the general election of that year he resigned office, in December, without waiting for Parliament to assemble. In February, 1874, his party returned to power with an immense Parliamentary majority, and its six years' tenure of office, with Disraeli at its head, was distinguished by a bolder and more active foreign policy than that of any former administration for a long period, leading to the treaty of Berlin, 1878, and a new invasion of Atghanistan, and exciting a strong agitation and conflict of opinion at home, the final result being the overthrow of the government in April, 1880, when the prime minister retired from office with the title of Earl of Beaconsfield, and his political career, one of the most extraordinary in English history, came to an end. 1. "The controversial part of the book is subordinate to the decorative effects in which Mr. Disraeli delights as heartily as when Lord Codlingsby, five-and-twenty years ago, visited Rafael Mendoza at his sumptious palace in Holy well Street. The true precursor of the author of 'Lothair' was the biographer of Aladdin. . . There is always something attractive in the preservation through maturity of the innocent tastes of early life; and it is pleasant to find that Mr. Disraeli still cherishes the ducal illusions which fascinated his youth."—Sat. GENERAL CRITICISM:

General Criticism:

"He reigns where Prior and Praed have reigned before him, and this is no little thing to say of any man. . . . He is not merely a writer of vers de société: he is a fabulist, a dramatist in parvo, a lyrist pure and simple. The only occasions upon which he seems to me to fall are those in which he attempts the romantic and heroic styles. . . . But in his own way, how perfect an artist, how exquisite a poet! . . . He is always the same acute and refined observer; passing lightly over the surface of things, . . . and touching the harmonlous frivolities of by-gone times as the fingers of some maestro might lightly run over the keys of an old-fashioned harpsichord."—E. w. A practical study of the life of the Plains, made by an officer whose duties and tastes have kept him hunting the Indians and the game that he here describes during much of his twenty-five years' service. . . He has made an interesting book, whose very simplicity attests its truth, and the subjects discussed give it value. —Nation, xxiv. 91.

"He gives the most exhaustive practical account of the beasts of the practics and towls of the air that we have ever met with. But he also supplies a complete and comperhensive sketch of the physical configuration of the United States territories from the Mississippl Valley westward to the great mountain-ranges, and from the Canadian line on the north to the Mexican frontier to the southward. . A great part of his book is devoted to the 'noble savage,' of whom, we may remark in passing, he entertains the meanest opinion. But we doubt whether any man since the days of Catlin has written on the subject with better information or authority; while the vivacity and evident fidelity of many of his picturesque descriptions remind us greatly of the inimitable Ruxton, and we can scarcely give them higher commendation."—Sat. He was called to the bar in 1841, and in 1842 emigrated to New Zealand, his departure from England being mourned by his inti-mate friend Robert Browning in the poem entitled Waring. "Every fresh perusal of his work only serves to show beauties not previously observed; and one does not wonder that Mr. Browning thought his 'Ranolf and Amohia' agreat and astonishing performance, of very varied beauty and power, or that Lord Tennyson wrote of it as possessing 'intellectual subdety, great power of delineating delicious scenery, and imaginative fire.' In truth, it is by far the finest long poem yet written in Australasia."—Acad., xxxiv, 882.

"In this remarkable work he endeavoured to show that fragments of a book of Jashur are to be found throughout the Old Testament Scriptines up to the time of Solomon, that the book was compiled in the religious marrow of the Scriptures." Professor Aldis Wright praised the ingenuity of the theory; Thomas Love Peacock declared that it was of itself sufficient proof of Donaldson's genius; but it seems to have been generally felt that it rests far too absolutely on hazardous speculation."—RICHARD GARNETT: Dict. of Nat. Donne, William Bodham, [aute, vol. i., add.,] 1807-1882, was examiner of plays in the lord chamber-lain's office from 1857 to 1882. He was a contributor to the Saturday Review and other periodicals, also to Dr. Smith's classical dictionaries, and edited selections from several classical writers for Weale's series. 1. Essays on the Drama, Lon., 1858, p. 8vo. 2. (Ed.) The Correspondence of King George the Third with Lord North, from 1768 to 1783. Published by Permission of the Queen.

With an Introduction and Notes. Lon., 1867, 2 vols. 8vo.
"This Correspondence, being all on one side, would be more accurately described as the letters of George III. to Lord North.... As Mr. Donne, in his capacity of editor, is entirely free from the furor biographicus, his opinion that, of all the promoters of the American secession, the King was least in fault, deserves consideration."—Sul. Rev., xxiii. 237.

3. Euripides, ("Ancient Classics for English Readers,")
Edin., 1872, 12mo. 4. Tacitus, ("Ancient Classics,")
Edin., 1873, 12mo.

"A fair and temperate estimate of an historian whose merits were manifold and pre-eminent... Mr. Donne's interpretation of Tacitus's guiding spirit is certainly sound when he regards it as being of kin to that of Dante."

11. In and About Druy Lane, and other Papers: reprinted from "Temple Bar," Lon., 1881, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"His aim is to illuminate the heavier pages of history by anecdote and gossip, which, while amusing the reader, may also convey some impression of the political and social life of the epoch he describes... He is the veriest lover of chatter. Research, dates, changes in administration, party feuds, and the like, bore him supremely: but he can tell a story well, he can describe character, he delights in a good gossip over a scandal as much as a woman or a Frenchman, he appreciates humour, and his scent is never at fault whenever any of those incidents that bring out the weaknesses of women or the vices of men break cover."—A. Lon., 1886, 8vo. 3. Travels in Arabia Deserta. Illust. and Maps. Cambridge, 1888, 2 vols. 8vo.

"An author who takes Arabia for his field challenges comparison with the greatest modern writers of travel. It is the highest tribute we can pay Mr. Doughty to own that, with the charm of Burckhardt and Burton, Palgrave and Palmer, undiminished upon us, we judge his book to be the most remarkable record of adventure and research which has been published to this generation. He enjoyed opportunities that the experience of no one of his predecessors combined. He describes the life of the nomads with a minuteness and colour that will make his work stand for the Bedouin what Lane's famous description is for the modern Egyptians, while he succeeds in carving out individual characters from groups and classes in a way that Lane never attempted."—spectator, 1xi, 480.

"The extraordinary merits of Mr. Doughty's travels.
may possibly, we fear, be veiled at least to the general reader by some of the features of their presentation. The author in his prehere remarks that his book is not milk for babes; a hasty critic, with not much knowledge and little patience, might say that it is something much more like nalls and gravel for ostriches. It is immensely long.

It is written in a most miraculous style, suggesting a mixture of Mr. William Morris, Mr. George Mcredith, the late Mr. Carlyle, and the living sir Richard Burton.

As for the scientific results of his work, it is sufficient to say that his recovered inscriptions were printed by the Paris Institute, that authorities like M Renau and the Marquis de Vogué have acknowledged the light they cast on the mysterious Natathean monarchy, and the relation of its civilization to Greece on the one hand and to Islam on the vogue have acknowledged the light they east on the mysterious Nubathwan monarchy, and the relation of its evilization to Greece on the one hand and to Islam on the other. As for the book itself, we wish that it could be compressed, and to a certain extent translated; but its value as a storchouse of knowledge simply cannot be exaggerated."—Sat. Rev., 1xv. 391.

"My chief object has been to assist those who are engaged in the work of Christian missions; but for this purpose I have endeavoured to give a full view of the language so far as I have been able to learn it; and the book is fitted to be equally useful to merchants, travellers, marines, interpreters, and students."—Author's Preface.

"The Chinese words are expressed in the Roman character, and this will undoubtedly prove to be a great drawback to the usefulness of the Dictionary... Mr. Douglas holds out the hope that he may publish in a few years a key to the present work, in which he promises to supply as many of the Chinese characters as it is possible to identify. When this is done, it will, for all ordinary purposes, be the best Dictionary in the language yet published."—

"There can be no doubt that he has an unusual insight into the broader as well as the nicer meanings of Shakspeare. In a manner which may be termed 'an honest method, as wholesome as sweet,' he traces by some certain and some supposed steps the growth of Shakspeare's faculties and the course of their development, taking the plays now singly, now in groups, and assigning them to their place in the order which he has found for their creation."

"Professor Dowden's study of the man Shakspere seems to me the best work of the kind that has been written in our language. . . . The great body of the work is built on sound induction, out of which no more is drawn than has been put into it."—R. Simpson: Acad., vii. 211.

lowden's critiques without discovering that the power of the commonplace is ubiquitous and inevitable, and that we vamly seek to escape from it by flying from the world's common objects and interests. And his narrative is enriched by a calm and mel507 with Shelley, and Southey's Dream: with an Introduction, Dublin, 1881, 8vo.

"Professor Dowden, than whom no man living, except perhaps Sir Henry Taylor, could be more fitted to execute the delicate task has done his work of editing with all the tact and taste which can be wished. . . . It does not, indeed, shed any new light upon the character or career of Southey,—no new light was needed there,—but it gives a charming miniature study of one of those rare women of sympathetic nature who interest us so much as the satellites of genius. Caroline Bowles demands half our attention in this book, and the other half is claimed by the singular relations between Southey and Shelley which are now for the first time revealed."—Sot. Rev., [iii. 20.

"The reason why Southey's correspondence with the lady who eventually became his second wife has waited so long for publication must be taken to be that which, as Professor Dowden tells us, has induced on the present occasion the printing of a mere selection from it, namely, the voluminous correspondence of Southey which already exists in type.

As Miss Bowles got more familiar with her patron she dropped something of the adoring attitude, developed a pleasant wit, and frequently manifested decided opinions of her own; while Southey on his side fell into the delightful vein of gossiping letter-writing which he could work when he chose, and which shows not the Southey of the 'Quarterly Review,' but the Southey of 'The Doctor."—Ath., No. 2826.

"At last the world is in possession of that complete life of Shelley, sanctioned by his family and embodying their hitherto carefully reserved materials, which has often been asked for, and sometimes demanded with a certain degree of impatience. ... By the Shelley family, the Erdaile fanily, (Shelley's grandchildren through his first daughter, Ianthe.) Mr. Forman, Mr. Slack, (in respect of the curious and important Hitchener Correspondence,) and others, Professor Dowden has been furnished with matter hitherto unknown or imperfectly known; and he has made good use of it. He writes in the spirit which belts a biographer of Shelley. He believes in Shelley's poetry and his genius; discerns that his character was in some respects singularly beautiful, and his opinions ardent and sincere, if extreme; is willing to believe in his general goodness if he can find adequate grounds for doing so; and scrutinizes the evidence in the hope of finding such grounds, but with a reluctant willingness to give judgment against him on particular points if that proves to be the only course consistent with the evidence. He dwells on nothing invidiously, but adversely on various things. .. His essential though sympathetic moderation of tone is matched by his equability of language: he avoids controversy as far as possible and is never overheated. On occasion he exhibits an incident or describes a scene with effect; but he does not strive to be incisive, or to stimulate the reader to strong and one-sided conclusions. The book is readable rather than powerful or pictorial."—Ath., No. 3985.

"Mr. Dowden has given us such a picture of the man as for fidelity, literalness, and fulness of detail may never again be equalled. He has done everything for Shelley that industry, insight, faithfulness, and loyalty could do. But the total effect produced is not invigorating to the better part of our sympathies. ... No twithstanding Shelley's earnestness, his sincerity, his unselfishness,

"The best of Sir Francis Doyle's reminiscences date from a period prior to 1846.... He is out of sympathy with the political life of the present day, and the tone of some of his later recollections and opinions is old-fashioned, if not discordant. But, taking the volume as a whole, the reminiscences are those of a genial man of wide culture and broad sympathies; and they form a collection of a needotes which, as the production of a single man, is unrivalled in interest, in variety, and in novelty."—Ath., No. 3077.

"The author of these three handsome quarto volumes has employed half a lifetime in the production of a book which is absolutely unique both in its design and execution. . . . The few mistakes which disfigure this useful book are chiefly found in lives of peers of the Anglo-Norman period, where Mr. Doyle has been content to repeat the received story without critical examination."—E. Spectator, Ivl. 86.
"Mr. Doyle's stand-point is not that of a sociologist, but of a student of institutional history... He has enjoyed remarkable facilities for examining colonial documents preserved in the State Paper Office in London... Mr.
Doyle has viewed the English side of America, and he is consequently better able than most Americans to appreciate the principle of English continuity in our colonial

6. Lectures on Poetry, delivered before the University of Oxford in 1858, Lon., 1869, p. 8vo.

"For the most part the lectures are rightly devoted to inquiries into some of the elements of poetry. . . They are for the most part singularly graceful in style, displaying the command of language which is best attained in 510.

"Nation, xxxvi. 87.

4. The English in America: the Puritan Colonies, Lon., 1868, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The thoroughness of Mr. Doyle's researches is conspicuous in every chapter of this history. Whenever and wherever contemporary MSS, materials exist, they have been carefully studded. In their absence the most reliable authorities have been consulted, and, when necessary, compared, so as to arrive at the nearest possible truth; and all this, we think, has been done with judgment and success."—W. Noel Sainsbury: Acad., xxxi. 121.

"He has gone over the field so often travelled in part by our specialists, and so theroughly explored as a whole by Dr. Palfrey, and he gives us an admirable resume of the facts and of the impressions made by them upon the mind of an educated Englishman. . . These two volumes . . are attractive in style, full of careful research, impartial in judgment, and doubly valuable as giving the opinions of one not blinded to our faults by ties of birth or education."—Nation, xlv. 489.

"We are heartly of opinion that, despite the value of what scholars on this side of the Atlantic have written about the Puritan colonies in America, this work of Doyle's excels all."—Critic, viii. 228.

"Dr. Draper takes one cause, climate, ... and makes it account for nearly every social phenomenon with which he has to deal. ... Of the narrative portion of Dr. Draper's work we cannot speak too highly. His sketch of the events which led to the war, and his summing of the Northern and Southern sides of the controversy, are models of calm, perspections, and judicial statements. ... His book, as a whole, will edify a large public indifferent to military criticism and accuracy of military detail."—Natum, v. 207, and xi. 94. and xi. 94

"In this country the name of Dr. Draper became famous in one hour... The celebrated Belfast address of Professor Tyndall, and the thoroughness of his expressed trust in the accuracy and ability of Dr. Draper, sent many people with a rush to the perusal of his works... It was unfortunate, however, for the reputation of Dr. Draper that the great eulogium of Professor Tyndall was pronounced not on his scientific but on his literary works. For, as these 'Memoirs' show, Dr. Draper has been for many years a careful, diligent, and successful worker in the physical departments of science, and has, without For, as these 'Memoirs' show, Dr. Draper has been for many years a careful, diligent, and successful worker in the physical departments of science, and has, without question, extended the boundaries of our scientific knowledge. . . World, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo; 23d ed., (82d thousand.) 1888.

"No one who reads the papers entitled 'Biogenesis.' Degeneration,' Eternal Life,' and 'Classification,' to say nothing of the others in this volume, will fail to recognize in Mr Drummond a new and a powerful teacher, impressive both from the scientific calminess and accuracy of his view of law, and from the deep religious earnestness with which he traces the workings of law in the moral and spiritual sphere. . He attempts to show how the same laws which science has discovered in the phenomena of Nature continue, and can be traced, in the phenomena of the spiritual world; how such great principles as biogenesis,—the origination of life only out of what is already living,—not only by analogy, but identically, govern the course of spiritual, as they have been proved to govern that of natural, phenomena. He takes, therefore, some of the chief laws of nature as they have been discovered and stated by evolutionists, and demonstrates their identity with those principles of Christianity which have hitherto been accepted on authority, but have never been reduced to law or compared with the laws of nature. Biogenesis becomes in religion regeneration; spiritual death is want of correspondence; eternal lite is perfect correspondence with the spiritual environment—God; conformity to type is conformity to the image of his Son."—Spectator, 1v1. 997.

Ducat, Arthur C. The Practice of Fire Under-writing: 7th ed., N York, 1862, 8vo. Du Chaillu, Paul Belloni, b. 1835, in Louisiana; spent his early life in a French settlement at the mouth of the Gaboon River on the west coast of Africa, where his father was engaged in trade; from 1852 to 1855 lived in the United States; spent the greater part of the next four years in a journey of exploration in the Gaboon country, travelling on foot upwards of 8000 miles, and making a large collection of native arms and implements, as well as birds and quadrupeds which he had shot and stuffed, including of native arms and implements, as well as birds and Library, (Camden Soc.,) Lon., 1879, 4to. 5. Papers, quadrupeds which he had shot and stuffed, including gorillas and other species previously unknown or unclassified; returned to the United States in 1859, and 6. (Ed.) Lon., 1861, 8vo.

"The harvest by which M. Du Chaillu's labours were rewarded was, beyond all comparison, more abundant than any of his recent fellow-labourers have reaped. Neither Burton, nor Livingstone, nor Magyar have produced anything approaching in interest to the wonderful disclosures by which M. Du Chaillu's courage and sufferings have been reputd. . . The chief interest of the narrative, of course, centres in the Gorilla."—Sat. Rev., xi. 506.

2. A Journey to Ashango Land, and Further Fenetration into Equatorial Africa, Lon., 1867, 8vo.

"M. Du Chaillu's last journey was one series of misfortunes, succeeding each other with the most depressing monotony. . . To take a sufficient quantity of bulky goods to buy one's way across the great jungle of Equatorial Africa seems to be an almost insoluble problem. The chief interest of M. Du Chaillu's book is therefore in the light which it throws upon the condition of the negro."

"His great merit lies in his fine descriptions of the scenery and physical characteristics of the country, and in his accurate and sympathetic account of the manners and customs of the peasantry. We think he is sometimes too lavish in his praise of these rude peoples; . . . but his pictures of their interiors, of their daily occupations, of their dances and weddings and other festive gatherings, and of their religious worship, are so true and lite-like that we can easily forgive him for not having the heart to find fault with a race to which he became fondly attached. . . . Literature, history, science, and art do not come within the scope of his work."—Nation, xxxiii, 455.

"In spite of redundancy, repetition, and refteration, these two volumes contain a great deal which disarms attack and merits consideration."—Sat. Rev., lii. 700.

"From a literary point of view the book is not without its faults; the dramatic persona are sometimes made to speak and write in a stilled and sententious way, inconsistent with the character given of them. The author arrives in the country ignorant of the language, but very soon begins—in the book—to speak it. Probably the descriptions of places and events are not to be taken as strictly consecutive."—Ath., No 2817.

"Mr. Dunphie is wholly genial in the range of his sympathies; he is delightfully unacademic; he is very observant; he is very reflective, and, like Charles Lamb, he can talk about himself in the quaintest of ways. His observation of nature is less elaborate than that of Jeffries or John Burroughs, but within its own limits and for its own quite different ends it is as satisfactory. But, fond as Mr. Dunphie is of nature, he is much fonder of people. The ways of men and women are really the favourite subjects of his half-humorous, half-pathetic studies."—Acad.

"The subject of this biography was not only a most successful medical practitioner, and not only even a scientific renius, but he was, what is still better, and what makes the charm of this biography, a man of a highly interesting character and of sterling excellence. This is a book which enthralls the heart, and is a record of domestic virtues and of private life which it is often difficult to read without tears."—Spectator, xlvi. 1155.

Dutt, Toru, 1856-1877, youngest of the three daughters of Govin Chunder Dutt, a magistrate in his native province and a man of learning and cultivation, who survives them all. She made a very thorough study of the language and literature of France and of England, and in 1874 published a very full and learned essay on the writings of Leconte de Lisle, with translations into English verse. Having devoted herself to the study of Sanskrit, she translated the Vishnupurana into English blank verse. Meanwhile she was composing and translating poetry with extraordinary assiduity and apparently with equal case in Hindustani, French, and English. She wrote also a romance in French, Le Journal de Mlle. d'Arvers, which was published in Paris, with a critical study by Mile. Clarisse Bader, in 1879. She left some original poems in English, and other productions. 11. A Sheaf gleaned in French Fields, Bhowanipore, 1876; 2d ed., with a Prefatory Memoir by her Father, Lon., 1881, 8vo. "As the work before us was the latest, so it was the most considerable and enduring product of John Endie's fruitful pen. It manifestly embodies the results of many years of quiet study, in the course of which he must have found not a few of his own researches auticipated with the public by more brilliant or less patient writers. Indeed, we may safely conjecture that our modest author would scarcely have taken up the subject at all had Canon Westcott's masterly sketch of the self-same history appeared a few years earlier. But what the Scottish divine lacks of his rival's vigour and originality is amply compensated by minuteness of detail and rigid impartiality."—Sot. Rev.,

The opinions

"The spirit is as eatholic as one can ask. The opinions are as liberal as any can desire... And yet we can conceive that, for all the catholicity of spirit and the liberality of opinion, this book will be as little to the tast; of the average liberal as to that of the average conservative Nation, xlvii. 279.

"The greater part of the work is devoted . . . to showing how the spoils system in England grew out of the absolute ownership of offices by the crown, and was modified but not improved by the substitution of party government; and how, as its abuses became rank and intolerable, a rising spirit of public reprobation kept pace with them, till at last the sense and virtue of the English people overpowered the selfishness of a class and triumphed by the destruction of the system. The author makes skilful use of the occasions such a review presents for enforcing the need and the practicability of just such a national purgation among ourselves."—Nation, xxx. 46.

"The inquiry to which the author has here devoted far more attention than it has hitherto received is not altogether new. For a century and a half the critics have recognized in Milton an assimilative instinct, over which his mental constitution did not enable him to exercise much control. It was a perfectly natural instinct with him; it invigorated his poetic capacity, and stands in no need of excuse or defence. . Of later years the Dutch poet Vondel has been regarded by his countrymen as Milton's chief creditor. . . "The correspondence is well selected and well woven together; the character is drawn without adulation and without concealment of those imperfections which do not, after all, impair its high worth and dignity; and the result is that we have a valuable addition to that mass of hiographical literature which conveys more sound and practical teaching than volumes of hontiles and sermons. . . . The story of such a life and death, of difficulties so manfully encountered, of earnestness at the last so tempered with charity, and of duty so nobly performed, may well be read with advantage by young Englishmen of every class and profession."—Sat. kev., xxxiii, 665, 701.

"The vexatiousness of Sir Herbert Edwardes's style, its prosiness, and its exaggeration, hinder the real interest of the first volume from making itself felt. . . . mere book of travel, though it is enlivened with the incidental narratives and picture-que descriptions customary in such a volume. . . The style of the whole book is marked by precision and sustained vigour. . . All the attractive and popular qualities which I have enumerated are placed by the author at the service of a strong and ardent passion for Egyptian archæology. . . It is this enthusiasm for old Egypt, running powerful and deep throughout the volume as an undercurrent to its many other interests, that gives its real charm to the work."—

Mr. Eggleston's stories have held from the beginning a "Mr. Eggleston's stories have held from the beginning a great popularity with a large circle of readers, and it has been in many ways well deserved. They are full of incendent; all of these rapid events occur amid scence almost entirely new to the Eastern reader and the new generation of Westerners; and they have in a high degree the element of dialectic speech, which . . . coniers upon the personages of the story that appearance of reality and individuality for which the novel-writer has to watch so keenly and work so hard."—Nation, xix. 207.

"If we feel that we could sometimes have spared some of the copious learning which Mr. Ellis brings to bear on his subject, our general feeling is one of the most genume admiration. Its variety and plenty is such as it is difficult to describe. One peculiarity of it is that it passes, for the most part, the more familiar authors to deal with those who are strange even to the well-read scholars of the for the most part, the more familiar authors, to deal with those who are strange even to the well-read scholars of the ordinary stamp. He has drawn, he says in his preface, his parallel citations and illustrations 'from the predecessors or contemporaries rather than from the followers of Catullus; from the less backneyed writers, such as Plautus, Lucilius, Varro, rather than from such as have become insipid by familiarity; from Greek preferably to Latin.' It is difficult to describe how consistently this has been done. It is not too much to say that most scholars will often find themselves introduced to an almost unknown world of ancient literature by this 'Commentary'' Spectator, 1,568. Spectator, 1, 568.

After graduating in 1821, he taught school for three years, attended lectures at the Cambridge Divinity School, entered the Unitarian ministry, and in 1829 became the colleague of Henry Ware at the Second Church in Boston In 1832 he resigned his charge, announcing the scruples which led him to do so in a sermon on "The Lord's Supwhich led him to do so in a sermon on "The Lord's Supper," afterwards published among his works. He continued, however, to preach occasionally in Unitarian pulpits for several years. In 1833 he went to Europe, visited Italy, Sicily, and France, spent some time in England, and paid a visit to Carlyle at Craigenputtock. In 1835 he settled at Concord, Mass. He delivered courses of lectures in Boston during several successive winters; founded in 1836 the society which saquired the winters; founded in 1836 the society which acquired the name of the Transcendental Club, and was a contributor to The Dial during its brief existence, 1846-44, and for two years its editor. In 1847 he revisited England, lecturing in Manchester, London, and other towns, and in 1848 he made an excursion to Paris. On the establishment of the Atlantic Monthly in 1857 he became a contributor, and many of his poems were published in its pages. In the years before and during the civil war he lectured on the questions involved in the conflict. 1872 his house at Concord was partially destroyed by fire. It was rebuilt by his friends, and he paid a third visit to Europe, remaining abroad about a year lectured occasionally till 1876, but in the last years of his life his memory became much impaired. In 1881 he read a paper on Carlyle before the Massachusetts Historical Society. For biog., see Cabot, J. L., enpra, GARNETT, R., and HOLMES, O. W., infra: also CONWAY, M. D., and COOKE, G. W., supra. "The first eight volumes of the present edition of Mr. Emerson's writings contain his collected Essays as he left them, except some revision of the punctuation and the correction of obvious mistakes. The ninth volume comprises the pieces chosen by Mr. Emerson from the 'Poems' and 'May-Day' to form the 'Selected Poems,' with the addition of some poems which were omitted in that selection, and some that have remained unpublished. In many instances emendations which were pencilled in the margin by Mr. Emerson, but were not adopted in the 'Selected Poems,' are now introduced, upon the ground that, as they seem to have suggested themselves at the time when his powers were in their fullest vigor, it may fairly be supposed that he would, upon reconsideration, have admitted them. The tenth and eleventh volumes consist of lectures hitherto unprinted, and of 'Occasional Addresses' and other prose writings which have appeared separately or in periodicals,''—Prefatory Note by J. E. Cubot.

GENERAL CRITICISM :

General Criticism:
"His work is not of the stuff that one can clip searlet patches from. The matter and the form are inseparable, as one finds them in the best talk... He produces the effect of conversation rather than of literature; his thoughts are spoken out for the stirring of kindred thought rather than written down for learning."—Sal. Rev., xli. 275.

ble, as one finds them in the best talk. . . . He produces the effect of conversation rather than of literature; his thoughts are spoken out for the stirring of kindred thought rather than written down for learning,"—sci. Rev., xii. 275.

"It is just in the combination of an ideal height and range of thought with balance and sanity that we find Emerson's charm. He constantly teaches us in his informal way, as Berkeley taught us with classical English and philosophy, that idealism is nothing else than common sense transligured and enthroned above sophistry."—Sci. Rev., Ivii. 118.

"More than any of the other great writers of the age, he is a Voice. He is almost impersonal. He is pure from the taint of sect, clique, or party. He does not argue, but announces; he speaks when the Spirit moves him, but not longer. Better than any contemporary, he exhibits the might of the spoken word. He helps us to understand the enigma how Confucius and Buddha and Socrates and greater teachers still should have produced such marvellous effects by mere oral utterance."—Richard Garnert. Life of Emerson, ("Great Writers,") 188.

"Look through all Emerson's writings, and then consider whether in all literature you can find a man who has better fulfilled that aspiration stated in such condensed words by Joubert, 'to put a whole book into a page, a whole page into a phrase, and that phrase into a page, a whole page into a phrase, and that phrase into a word. . . And if you say that, nevertheless, this is nothing so long as an author has not given us a system of the universe, it can only be said that Emerson never desired to do this, but left on record the opinion that 'it is too young by some ages yet to form a creed. The system-makers have their place, no doubt; but, when we consider how many of them have risen and fallen since Emerson began to write.—Coleridge, Schelling, Cousin, Comte, Mill, and so on, down to the Hegel of yesterday and the Spencer of to-day,—It is really evident that the absence of a system cannot prove much more sh may be the highest and most inspiring imaginative clair-voyance to a brighter one. . . . Too much has been made of Emerson's mysticism. He was an intellectual rather than an emotional mystic, and withal a cautious one. He never let go the string of his balloon. He never threw over all his ballast of common sense so as to rise above an atmosphere in which a rational being could breathe."—Oliver Wendell Holmes: Life of Emerson, 390, 396.

"We have not in Emerson a great poet, a great writer, a great pilosophy-maker. His relation to us is not that of one of those personages; yet it is a relation of, I think, even superior importance. His relation to us is more like that of the Roman Emperor Marcus Aurelius. Marcus Aurelius is not a great writer, a great a philosophy-maker; he is the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit. Emerson is the same. He is the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit. Emerson is the same. He is the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit. All the points in thinking which are necessary for this purpose he takes; but he does not combine them into a system or present them as a regular philosophy. Combined in a system by a man with the requisite talent for this kind of thing, they would be less impressive than Emerson gives them to us; and the man with the talent so to systematize them would be less impressive than Emerson. They do very well as they now stand.—like 'boulders,' as he says.—in 'paragraphs incompressible, each sentence an infinitely repellent particle.' In such sentences his main points recur again and again, and become fixed in the memory. . . . Yes, truly, his insight is admirable; his truth is preclous. Yet the secret of his effect is not even in these; it is in his temper. It is in the hopeful, serue, beautiful temper wherewith these, in Emerson, are indissolubly joined; in which they work and have their being."—Mattriew Arnold: Discourses in America, 178-180, 193.

"Mr. Engel's English . . . has been described as jargon.

But the jargon is pleasant, lively, even expressive. . . .

As he knows a great deal about his art, and has consorted with many famous men, the score or so of causeries of which these volumes are composed may be read with both profit and pleasure."—Sat. Rev., 1811. 694.

"The few pages of Mr. Evans's introductory notice prepare the reader for finding, in this work of an anonymous biographer, matter of real "value and interest as a document illustrating the history of England in the seventeenth century." The editor has faithfully carried out his purpose of presenting the "manuscript, which came into his possession about fifty years ago, 'carelty as it stands, with all its characteristic faults of spelling, style, and composition, and the result is in most lively contrast with certain modern attempts at biographical representations of the style of two hundred years ago,"—Sat. Ren., xilii, 111.

"Mr. Farrar's object is 'to enter briefly into the causes, moral and intellectual, of the present wide-spread defection from the faith which our fathers held; to show that neither Philosophy nor Criticism has shaken one truth of Christianity; to show the extent and glory of its individual, social, and political victories; and thus to demonstrate the mighty Witness borne by History to the Faith of Christ.'... Dr. Farrar is familiar with the scenes and the customs of Palestine and its inhabitants, from his personal observation as well as from the accounts of other travellers; he is acquainted—as his notes constantly show—with all the authorities, ancient and modern, orthodox and rational contents of the contents o the authorities, ancient and modern, orthodox and rationalist, whose names he arrays in a long list: he is devoutly Christian in his faith; moderate and liberal after the manner of our English Church divines; desirous to aid the cause of truth and righteousness' by what he writes; and with these qualifications, intellectual, moral, and religious, he pours forth the torrents of rhetoric which form these two volumes. . . The words are too big for his thoughts, and the poverty of the fancies is not concealed by the tinsel epithets with which they are tricked out."—Spectator, xivii. 886.

"They seem to us to exhibit all the faults of his earlier efforts in an exaggerated form, without possessing some of the qualities which helped to atone for them. The style, in particular,—never a strong point with our author,—is unlikely to satisfy even his ardent admirers, fluctuating as it does between turgid rhetoric and a tone of jaunty familiarity better suited to the columns of the American daily press. . There can be no question as to the value and importance of his labours, if only they approximate to his ideal standard; and it is because, in our judgment, they fail to do so that we can accept them with but qualified approval."—Sat. Rev., Xiviii. 603. "The success which his work has met with is easily understood. There is the charm of a refined rhetorical style, not too heavily freighted with thought. The reader floats easily and lazily along, past all the whirlpools of modern criticism, and without a jar arrives at the destined conclusion. The flavour of learning of a vast and multitudinous kind is presented. There is everywhere a studied reverence and a careful setting forth of conclusions precious to the hearts of thousands, and great care is taken to keep the dry details of history out of view. . . . We get little help from Canon Farrar to the solution of the many to keep the dry details of history out of view. . . We get little help from Canon Farrar to the solution of the many critical problems which have arisen in recent years in relation to the Epistles of Paul and to the Acts of the Apostles. . . . The reader of these volumes might read them through without becoming aware of the weighty controversies which are now agitating the Churches on these questions. . . . It is, however, true that readers of this book will gain a more vivid conception of the moral, social, and religious condition of the world when Christianity went forth for the regeneration of the nations. . . . Canon Farrar has largely succeeded in setting forth the outward circumstances, the social forces, the special training, which moulded the character of Paul. . . . His large acquaintance with the Jewish literature outside of and beyond the sacred books, and his profuse citation of relevant passages, often throw a flood of light on obscure passages in the life of Paul and on difficult passages in his writings, while the description he gives of the great controversy of the early Church, and of the intense bitterness which marked that contest, is characterized both by fulness of information and accuracy of statement. In 1858 he was deprived of sight by an accident, but in the next year returned to the university, where he took his M.A. degree and in 1863 was elected professor of political economy. He was elected M.P. for Brighton in 1865, and continued to represent that constituency till 1874, when he lost his seat in the general election, but two months later was returned for Hackney. In 1880 he became postmaster-general, and in 1883 was elected lord rector of Glasgow University. For biog., see Stephen, Leslin, infra. 1. "The doctrines which he preaches have at least the merits of simplicity and consistency. He has told us constantly that, whilst the rich are growing richer, the poor, if not growing poorer, are certainly not making any corresponding advance. He has given us his remedies, which consist principally in a compulsory system of education, and in the general adoption of the co-operative system in manufactures and agriculture. . . . His book is thoroughly honest, and honest in the sense of speaking unpalatable truth to the working-classes."—Sal. Rev., xxxi. 503.

"The main remedy for this vast evil which presents itself to Mr. Fawcett's mind seems to us utterly futile,—that is, the diffusion through the laboring classes of a sense of their duty to check population."—Nation, xiil. 10.

"Mr. Fawcett discusses various questions connected with pauperism, and explains what is in his view the right thing to be done with the House of Lords. Mrs. Fawcett dilates on the wrongs of women, and moreover sets forth, with the zeal of a thorough-going disciple, the merits of Mr. Hare's scheme of representation . . Perhaps both Mr. and Mrs. Fawcett are a little too certain of their own infallibility, and too much convinced that the very last

"Mr. Featherman has set himself a long and laborious task. To digest from the travellers' tales of the last two centuries, the reports of missionaries, and the more formal observations of recent explorers, all that can be ascertained of the social life of every tribe of the many races of mankind: to reconcile the contradictions of these various authorities: and to discriminate where prejudice or credulty may have led them wrong, are undertakings that demand a vast expenditure of time, a great accumulation of knowledge, and some critical acumen. Mr. Featherman is well equipped in these respects. He justly repudiates the faint praise that would damn him as a mere collector of facts and give him credit for nothing but industry in collecting them. He claims that he is writing, on the basis of facts collected from original authorities, a history of the peoples in their social capacity, including their manners and customs, their government, their religion, their superations, and their literary, artistic, and scientific advancement. He is, at any rate, engaged on a work which is such a storehouse of facts as the student of comparative sociology will not meet with elsewhere, arranged with simplicity and clearness."—Ath, No. 3125.

"The careful and indefatigable collection of facts which is shown in all his writings is conspicuous throughout the present volume, and the study he has brought to bear upon the elucidation of the monumental remains which form its professed object, and should justify its outlay, is beyond all praise. . The tale of the monuments of Sanchi and Amravati has been kept in subordination to certain speculations, not to say dogmas, of an ethnographical or a theosophic character, which have become fixed ideas in the writer's mind. . . Yet we feel, for our part too much beholden for the artistic treat which the second and substantial portion of the volume has afforded us, to find undue fault with what we may think shadowy and conjectural in the preliminary matter."—Sat. "It was a bold undertaking to present so vast a subject in the compass of a single volume of moderate size... Professor Fisher's previous works have shown that he possesses the wide acquirements requisite to the undertaking, and the clearness of exposition necessary to render his knowledge available. Yet we cannot but regret that he should not have allowed himself a broader canvas on which to depict the infinite details that crowd each other in the presentation.... Fitzgerald, Edward, 1809-1883, b. at Bredfield, Suffolk; was the son of John Purcell, of Kilkenny, Ireland, who took his wife's name of Fitzgerald. He was educated at Bury Grammar-School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1830 and formed life-long friendships with Tennyson and Thackerny. He married Lucy, daughter of Bernard Barton, the Quaker poet, (q. v., ante, vol. i.,) but a separation by mutual agreement took place soon afterwards. Fitzgerald spent agreement took place soon afterwards. Fitzgerald spent most of his life at his house near Woodbridge, Suffolk, devoting himself to his favorite studies and literary work. His books were issued anonymously; his translation of the Agamemnon was at first privately printed, and of a translation made by him of the Edipus Tyrannus and Coloneus of Sophocles he allowed only one friend in England to have a conv. 1. Fitz, G. W. Coomb Desert: a Novel, Lon., 1876, and Absal of Jami, in English verse, 1878; 5th ed., 8vo. (The first edition of the Rubaiyat fell absolutely dead from the press, and was soon consigned to the "fourpenny box" of second-hand dealers. D. G. Rossetti was one of its first admirers. Copies of it are now worth their weight in gold, owing partly to the belief that the poem, when again issued, was spoiled in re-vision. There is at least a great difference between the vision. There is at least a great difference between the first edition and the later ones.)

"It is not as a translation that the English-speaking people have accepted the 'Rubályát' into their literature,—it is as an original poem.'—Sat. Rev., lxi. 98.
"His fame will mainly rest on his marvellous rendering of the 'Quatrains' of Omar Khayyám, . . . which he has made to live in a way that no translation ever lived before. In his hands the 'Quatrains' became a new poem."—W. Aldis Wright: Dict. of Nat. Biog., xix. 12.
American edition, entitled The Ruba'iyát of 'Omar Khayyam: with an Accompaniment of Drawings by Elihu Vedder, Bost., 1884, 4to.
"Had the Ruba'iyát been translated into Latin or German four centuries ago, or into English within the memory of many still living. Albert Dürer and Blake would assuredly have been beforehand with Elihu Vedder. But neither Albert Dürer nor Blake, nor any other master dead and gone, could, I venture to think, have exceeded in sublimity and subtlety of conception at least a score of these extraordinary designs."—Amelia B. 6. Agamemnon: a Tragedy, taken from Æschylus, Lon., 1876, 4to.

"Convinced of the impossibility of presenting the Greek play in its integrity to English readers, and doubtful of his power to succeed where 'good versifiers and better scholars' had seemed to him to fail, he determined to recast the 'Agamemnon' of the Attle poet, adhering in parts to the original, and in parts diverging from it, according to his sense of fitness. The result is that, while the whole poem is profoundly penetrated with the Æschylean spirit, which it reproduces with wonderful vividness, and while certain portions are accurate transcripts from the original, the Greek student will find many of the most impressive passages suppressed, and some most curefully prepared effects omitted. . . Mr. Fitzgerald's style in the finest passages of this great torso has a weight, a computeness, and a picturesqueness, to find the proper parallel for which we must look back to Shakesperc's age."—J. B. Donne, Samuel Lawrence, Mr. J. R. Lowell, and twenty others. . . They are, in their general tone, just as charming asall who knew their writer looked for them to be. "Mainly devoted to the career of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. . . A new blography of the famous dramatist, orator, and wit is justified, as Mr. Fitzgerald explains, by the materials which have accumulated since Moore's life was given to the world. . . Mr. Fitzgerald writes throughout with his eye upon Moore's pages, and he is much concerned to destroy the character with which his first biographer had succeeded in investing Sheridan before the world. . . In spite of Mr. Fitzgerald's obvious industry, his volumes are unmethodical and discursive. To any one who wishes to turn over the pages and pick out good anecdotes about Sheridan or his contemporaries, they are pleasant enough reading. "We should be ungrateful not to admit that he has done his work laboriously and conscientiously, for he has given us a great deal of enjoyment. He had certain essential qualifications for his task.—a fervid appreciation of religious cloquence, a keen perception of Irish humour, and a heartfelt reverence for Father Thomas Burke. And for these very reasons we are sure he would be the first to admit that the Life might well have been written by a man who had the real biographical genlus which flowers, like the fabulous aloe, only once in some hundred years. . . . Father Burke was one of those remarkable men who might live in the friendship of unborn generations. He was nobly great, yet extremely human. . . In many respects he came nearer to the ideal of his Master's correct than any elergyman of whom we have ever read."—Sci. Rev., Ixi. 44. 12. (Ed.) "The O'Connell of this correspondence is a most human creature, good, lovable, honest, but no more heroic than ruffianly, and the chief impression it creates is of surprise that a character so ordinary should gain such surprising influence and make so'great a mark in the world's history.

The letters show us a man of stupendous vigour, of large and ready sympathies, of tender and deep domestic affections, of good sense and some acumen, and of religious feeling that is really touching in its child-like simplicity and unquestioning faith; but neither his religion nor his patriotism inspired him to the sterner virtues of austerity and self-sacrifice. Nor does he seem to have had a lofty or uncommon thought: indeed, the O'Connell of these volumes is as good as bread, and as ordinary." mell of these volumes is as good as bread, and as ordinary.

"This interesting volume contains more than the title-page promises. There are not only the incidents of the Yorkshire and Scottish life of Mrs. Fletcher, told by her-self, but a sympathetic memoir, also by Mrs. Fletcher, of her gentle daughter, Grace, and another of her son, Archi-bald, by his widow. The whole forms an attractive, and often amusing, picture of life in Great Britain in the last and present centuries. . . . It is emphatically a charming book."—4th., No. 2479.

"All claret would be port if it could,' and most American novels would be by Mr. Henry James if they had the luck. 'The Head of Medusa' is no exception to this rule. The situations, the 'international' combinations of English, Americans, and Italians, are constructed on the model of Mr. James's stories. . . . The padding, of which 'The Head of Medusa' is all compact, is sentimental in the manner of Miss Thackeray. . . . The book is full of talent."

"It is not the solving of a riddle, but the development of two or three simple, noble motives... The action is much simpler than anything the author has before attempted, and her style has gained correspondingly.... There is only so much of the fair Italian sky and sea as to throw into relief the figures, but so deft, so sympathetic is the choice, the few pages give the sense that all Italy is in the book."—Nation, xxxviii. 301.

"All histories of abstract ideas are liable to the same defect,—namely, that they tend to become mere abstracts of the books professedly published on the subject. Professor Flint is no exception. After an attempt, in an introduction of sixty pages, to pursue and disengage his idea through the early, classical, and mediæval periods, he fairly lapses into the usual system of analyzing books.

We are most thankful to Mr. Flint for the labour he has bestowed on giving in an intelligible form a summary of the speculations, or ideas, of Schlözer, von Müller. Kant, Schelling, Steffens, Görres, Krause, Lotze, many of whose books are either inaccessible or are too tolisome reading to repay the time it would cost to extract any valuable metal om the dross."—Sat. "Mr. Foley has at last brought his gigantic labours to a close... He has collected such a mass of curious and really valuable information as it is granted to very few students to gather by the researches of a lifetime. He has added materially to those recondite sources of authentic family history which are for the most part buried in private archives and guarded with superstitious exclusiveness from the vulgar gaze. He has drawn back the veil which for centuries had covered the working of the Jesuits in England, and which, while it was allowed to hide the doings of the fathers from the gaze of the profane, invested them with a glamour of awe and terror such as no secret society of past or present times has succeeded in throwing round its proceedings."—4th., No. 2912.

"He is one of the most distinguished of the many able police-officers of the Indian Service, and his share in the preventive and precautionary measures taken in Bombay during the Mutiny gained for him the esteem of every Anglo-Indian and the deep and lasting gratitude of the native inhabitants. Born and educated also wholly in India, he can speak of the thoughts and feelings of the natives almost as one of themselves. No living Englishman, indeed, is better entitled to be heard on the sources of our real dangers in India. . . The chief purpose of Mr. Forjett's book is to refute Sir John Kaye's theory of the causes of the Mutiny."—Ath., No. 2619.

Our Living Poets: an Essay in Criticism, Lon., 1871, p. 8vo. 2. (Ed.) The Works of P. B. Shelley, in Prose and Verse: with Notes, Lon., 1876-80, 8 vols. 8vo. Letters of John Keats to Fanny Brawne, written in the Years 1818 and 1819, and now given from the Original Manuscripts: with Introduction and Notes, Lon., 1878, 8vo. (Contains a portrait etched by W. B. Scott from Severn's drawing of Keats on his death-bed, a silhouette of Miss Brawne, and a fac-simile of one of the letters, printed on paper of the same kind as the original and manufactured in the same year.)
"Even the truest admirers of Keats will read these let ters with a sense that they are prying into what he would have kept from them if he could. . . We cannot say, then, that the reading of this little volume has given us anything like unmixed pleasure. We have felt all through it that we were guilty of an intrusion, which, like all intrusions into such a region, Keats would have warmly resented. And we have felt, too, something besides this, ... that much in these letters which Keats could easily have justified, and would have justified, if he had been writing a poem or a play, by the very simple expedient of making us see the object of his passion, as well as the glow of the subjective passion itself, has an uncomfortably naked, unnatural effect here, when we have only his own side of the relation, and hardly even a single glimpse of the other side of it. .. But, though this little book is in both the ways we have mentioned distasteful to us, it would be false to say that it is without interest. It bears the marks of Keats's genius in many of the letters, and the marks of his individual character in almost all."—Spectator, It. 410.

"We do not think Mr. Buxton Forman's publication necessary. It can hardly give pleasure to any one who cares for Keats, or, if it does, the pleasure is so mingled with pain that, to use the poet's own phrase, 'it tastes like brass on the palate.'"—Sal. Rev., xiv. 216.

"I think there is nothing dishonourable in the joy with which we welcome these dear relics of Keats. . . They relate to what happened nearly sixty years ago; hardly any one, except Mr. Severn and Mr. Wells, can remember any of the persons concerned; and the lady herself, to whom these letters were addressed, expressed before she died, in 1856, her belief that they would be eventually required for publication. There has, therefore, been no indecent hurry in the matter, and Mr. Forman has displayed in editing them a scrupulous care and a tasteful delicacy that will do him great credit. He is a bibliographer of gentus, and on every obscure point he has patiently concentrated the light of investigation."—Ebmunn W. Gosse: Acad., xiii. 111.

a conscientious reviewer."—Sal. Rev., xxviii. 12.

5. The Life of Charlos Dickens, Lon., 1871-74, 3 vols. Svo.

"A book which, in spite of the many traits of astonishing perceptive power, and prodigal generosity, and unbounded humour, contained in it, will certainly not add to the personal fascination with which Dickens is regarded by so many of his countrymen. . . On the whole, we cannot deny that Mr. Forster's biography was a very difficult book indeed to write, or that it has been well done. It has painted to us a picture morally much more disappointing than we expected, and it has perhaps dwelt on some of the most disappointing features at unnecessary length, and with a certain awkward air of half admission, half deprecation. There is far too much criticism on individual works of Dickens, to some of which Mr. Forster recurs repeatedly; and it does not appear to us that the criticism is always sound. . . But, with all these faults and shortcomings, Mr. Forster's Life of Dickens will always be eagerly read as long as Englishmen retain their delight in English literature. —Spectator, xivii. 174.

"The portrait of Dickens is, indeed, very incomplete and unsatisfactory; but it would be unfair to deny that it puts us in possession of many facts which render both the merits and the defects of the novels more intelligable. That will be its principal merit, for its independent interest is certainly less than might have been expected from the subject."—Sal. Rev., xxxvii. 182.

"On the whole, we have in Mr. Forster's biography a difficult work well done. We believe it gives with candor the means of forming a sound judgment of the nature and character of its subject. That it gives the true estimate of his literary genius and of the quality and rank of his various works we for one shall not say, but it would be strange indeed if the average reader and student of an author should think so highly of him and teel so warmly about him as his intimate friend, admirer, and biographer, with all a biographer's and all a friend's fealty and fondness. . . To the fulness of detail in the story of the novelist's exterior life, of his literary methods, and of the production and appearance of his books, we suppose no afterworker in this field can much hope to add anything that has escaped Mr. Forster's knowledge or scrutiny, or for which his copiousness has not found room."—Nation, xviii.

6. Life of Jonathan Swift: vol. i., 1667-1711, Lon.,

"With the conscientiousness and thoroughness to which his previous works have accustomed us, Mr. Forster has gathered, sifted, and interpreted the materials within his reach; there is in his book much that is new by the side of what is old, but more that is true in the place of what is false. In the way of positive discoveries of fresh facts of importance there is, as yet at all events, little to announce."—Sat Rev., xl. 714.

"To the student of the period, one of the most interesting in our annals, Mr. Forster's biography promises to be invaluable. . . . The writer seems to be overweighted by his materials: he has so much to say, so many errors to point out, so many objections to meet, so many allusions to explain, that the narrative is occasionally impeded and does not move freely. The author never stops without a cause, or without having some noteworthy fact to state, but nevertheless the reader, instead of being driven smoothly along the road, finds himself suddenly pulled up. The literary student will enjoy this heartly, for he is sure to gain generous refreshment at these halting-points, but the general reader, whose interest in Swift is comparatively slight, and whose knowledge of the age is superficial, will hardly appreciate the wealth of illustration Mr. Forster has at his command."—Spectator, xlix. 47.

"His work is the outcome of a long and high tradition.
He is one of those who look on morality as something not imposed on man from without, but the resultant, the realization, of his whole nature. . . . He has produced what is, perhaps, for students the best existing work on the subject. It will show them how the lessons of their old text-books can without any strain beso extended as to cover the vast and complex interests of modern life."—Alfred W. Benn: Acad., xxxii. 47.

"Thrown partly by accident, partly by the connections of her family and her father's scientific reputation, partly by her own personal charm and her delight in the society of remarkable people, into contact with an extraordinary number of such persons, Miss Fox had also the industry to make notes of what she heard and saw, and the genius (for no lesser word will do) to put these notes in the most striking if also the least pretentious manner. The persons chietly illustrated in these 'Memories' are Derwent and Hartley Coleridge, J. S. Mill, Sterling, Carlyle, and Bunsen; but it is hardly too much to say that few Englishmen or residents in England celebrated in science and letters between 1840 and 1850 fail to make some appearance here." tween 1840 and 1850 fail to make some appearance here."-

"The bold, clear, nervous English of the book is throughout in admirable harmony with the clear, definite treatment of its subject, the precision with which it expresses the principles on which its author works, and the vigour with which he works them out. Not less remarkable is Mr. Freeman's command over the enormous mass of facts which he has laid under contribution. The book is a perfect mine of learning on the subject which it treats. . . . There is evidently a powerful attraction for Mr. Freeman in the outer aspects of war and policy which throughout tends to lead him away from the examination of those deeper questions which lie beneath them. . . . Throughout there is too much of wars and witenagemots, and too little of the life, the tendencies, the sentiments, of the peo-"The bold, clear, nervous English of the book is through-"The results of the whole investigation can scarcely be called satisfactory. The number of institutions for which a common origin is claimed is small, and, what is worse, the proof on which it rests is very slender "-Acad., v. 277.

"Mr. Freeman has compared Greek, Italian, and Teutonic institutions in an excellent manner. But the object for which the comparison was instituted he has altogether failed, in our opinion, to attain. We cannot find that he has thrown any light upon the primitive Aryan constitution; or, rather, we think that the facts he has adduced tend to a conclusion quite different from that which he has drawn."—4th., No. 2413.

"It is not too much to say that the publication of this work has been an era in historical study among English-speaking peoples; his glowing pages are the medium through which the results of the profound scholarship of others as well as himself have become a common possession. If his patrictism at times almost verges on chauvinsm, if his hero-worship often blinds him to the faults of his favories, his tone is at any rate always healthy and elevated; he never turns vices into virtues, his enthusiasm is never lavished upon vulgar and factitious excellences."—Nation, xxiii. 381.

"It is the work of a real historian, not of a mere historical critic, one endowed with a sense of art and symmetry, and able to paint a battle or a man. Its defects are those incident to the author's position as a ploneer in the field of history. "From Mr. Freeman's point of view—or rather from one of his many points of view, for he looks at his subject in many aspects—the period from the accession of William Rufus down to the overthrow of Robert of Bellème by King Henry was the time in which was worked out the problem of reconciling the English nation to the Norman Conquest, of nationalizing, as Mr. Freeman expresses it, the Conquest and the dynasty which the Conquest had brought in. . . . There are no signs of the weariness and exhaustion that sometimes mark a continuation. Mr. Freeman is as profoundly interested in his work, as decided in his views of right and wrong, as minute and careful in working out every detail, as ever."—Sal. Rev., 1111, 506.

careful in working our every ucuan, as constitutions in the leventh century are depicted with all the wealth of detail, all the vividness of narrative, all the fulness of local and personal knowledge, which distinguish Mr. Freeman's history of the Norman Conquest. The first course is precisely adapted to an audience that had never heard of Mr. Freeman or of 'the English people in their three homes.' The thought is excessively diluted, but it is agreeably stated, and will prepare the neophyte very satisfactorily for the stronger meat of the second course. . . "His desire to be fair has led him to be so cautious that it is really often very difficult to get from his book a distinct idea of what his impressions were. . . His book is in part a labored attempt to show that we are more English than anything else. . . It is a very misleading kind of criticism. It is only by seeing how our life differs from English life that we get any clear idea about ourselves."—Nation, xxxvi. 494.

"He tells us that his book is the fruit of a six months' visit to the United States; and surely to have observed so carefully, to have accumulated so many facts in so short a time, must be looked upon as no ordinary performance. Nor is it his industry alone that deserves praise: Mr. Freeman desires to see the object fairly, and he reproduces the impression it makes upon him with much faithfulness; the result is that the likeness of Brother Jonathan which is accepted in England as exact is seen to be a mere carleature."—Spectator, lvi. 897. "However well meant, this work is not well executed.
... An uncritical reader will carry from its perusal a useful. working, dictionary-article view of the great Italian thinker: but, for scholars conversant with his work and times, the Life of Giordano Bruno has yet to be written."

"The merit of the book is that to its writer the philosophy of Bruno is vital and full of attraction. ... Bruno's writings have been studied with scrupulous care, and in them the author has found a message for herself, and has succeeded in setting forth that message for others to hear and understand."—Ath. Froude, James Anthony, LL.D., [ante, vol. i., add.,] b. 1818, at Darlington, Devonshire; son of the late Ven. R. H. Froude, Archdeacon of Totnes; was educated at Westminster School, and at Oriel College, Oxford, where he came under the influence of the Tractarian movement, of which his brother, Richard Hurrell Fronde, (q. v., ante, vol. i.,) was one of the leaders. 1840 he took his degree with a second class in Classics, and in 1842 he gained the Chancellor's prize for an English essay, and was elected Fellow of Exeter College. In 1844 he took deacon's orders in the Church of England. A fundamental change of views led to his abondonment of his fellowship and of a clerical life, and, being debarred by his orders from a profession, he devoted himself entirely to letters, contributing largely to Fraser's Magazine and to the Westminster Review. the former periodical he was for some time editor at a later period, resigning that office in 1871. In 1867 he was elected rector of the University of St. Andrews. In 1867 he In 1872 he took advantage of the Clerical Disabilities Act to relinquish formally the office of deacon. In the autumn of the same year he visited the United States and delivered lectures on the relations between England and Ireland, which led him into an animated controversy with Father Thomas Burke, supra, the Dominican orator. In 1874 he was sent by the government of Lord Beacons-field to the Cape of Good Hope on a mission connected with the scheme for the federation of the South African colonies. Later he made a voyage to Australia and another to the West Indies. He was one of the executors of Carlyle, and was intrusted with the task of editing his literary remains and writing his life. His editions of Carlyle's Reminiscences, &c., and of Mrs. Carlyle's Letters are entered under the names of the writers, supra. 1. History of England from the Fall of Wolkey to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada, Lon. 1856-70, 12 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1881-82, cr. 8vo. (The title was originally History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Death of Elizabeth. Vols. i.-iv. are mentioned ante, vol ii.)

"He writes under the auspices of a new school of his-"He writes under the auspices of a new school of historical composition, which requires effect to be produced not by brilliant rhetoric and imposing generalization but by minute accuracy of detail. . . Mr. Froude has evidently a genuine love of historical research, which has led him to make the most of the increased copiousness of his materials; and the chapters of his book on the Protestants, on Ireland, on Scotland, on the Pilgrimage of Grace, and on the French War, as well as many minor portions of the work, are so much fuller than the accounts of the same subjects given by his predecessors, that they may be said to be additions to the history of England. . . . The details are selected with judgment and taste, and thrown into a vivid and striking form by the powers of a fine imagination. The narrative moves slow; nor has Mr. Froude the rare gift of preserving the perfect unity of a great historical drama amidst great complexity of events and frequent shiftings of the scene. . . The book is greatly overloaded with long quotations from State Papers; but this arises less from a fault of literary judgment than from an exaggerated estimate of the historical and moral value of everything that proceeded from the government of Henry VIII. . . Mr. Froude has a great command of beautiful imagery, which, as might be expected, sometimes runs a little wild. The tone of his writing is sometimes runs a little wild. The tone of his writing is sometimes rather mawkish: we come to read history, not to sigh over it. But this again is the exaggeration of a genuine sensibility which lies at the root of a good deal of the excellency of his work. . . The extended religious experience and converse which Mr. Froude has gone through in the course of his devious theological career has given him a great advantage in depicting the various shades of religious sentiment and the various phases of religious party. . . We doubt whether in this great qualification for portraying the phases of a complicated, various, and wavering religious movement, he has ever had a superior among historians. But Mr. Froude does not possess the same advantages in dealing with questions of politics, jurisprudence, or political economy, as in dealing with religious questions. . . . Mr. Froude seems to have thought that it would be an unsatifactory result of all his laborious researches if they ended in furnishing him merely with a mass of new and interesting details illustrating the received view of the occurrences of the time, or even with some important modifications of that view in regard to questions of a secondary kind. Some great discovery must be made to reward adeq ure of circumstances, to sacrifice to his sense of public duty."—Edinburgh Review, eviit. 206 et seq.: review of vols, i.-iv.

"It is an eminently readable book. Of all Mr. Froude's high qualities as a historium, we should place picturesqueness first; his account of the Armada, for instance, is even finer than Mr. Motley's, and the chapters on the rebellions in Ireland are exceedingly graphic. Hardly infetior to this, if inferior at all, is his power of grasping the essential ideas of the period of which he is treating, and placing them clearly and strongly before the reader. .. His powers of analysis, both of policy and character, are good, although less marked than the qualities already mentioned. .. While ... we do not think that Mr. Froude's place will be in the first rank of historians, we do not hesitate to pronounce this work an adequate and worthy history of that great period during which the change was made from Popery to Protestantism, and at the same time the English nation entered upon that career of enterprise and adventure, of thought and action, which conducted to the great revolutions and the muritime ascendency of the seventeenth century."—Nation, x. 323.

revolutions and the muritime ascendency of the seventeenth century."—Nation, x. 323.

"The writer possesses many of the qualifications necessary to an historian of the first rank. With ample materials gathered and deciphered at the expense of time and labour which none can properly estimate who has not himself tried the process; with a power of graphic delineation, and a skill in the selection of such incidents as give completeness and interest to the narrative; with an insight into the characters that pass before him in the panoramic picture which prepares for a fair estimate of their capacity; with the patriotic feelings of an Englishman, the love of freedom natural to a Protestant, antipathy to despotism, spiritual as well as political, sympathy with man's intellectual and moral progress, the historian takes a high place among those whose reputation is destined to endure. Mr. Froude is never dull or wearisome, though his history abounds in details. Weaving his web with constructive art, it comes forth from his hands having mark and finish upon it."—Ath., No. 2198.

But in such matters differences of opinion are inevitable, and, as a rule, the tone of his sketch seems to us to be temperate and its candour undentable. . . In general Mr. Froude's book has little enough of freshness either in its method of treating its subject or in the conclusions at which it arrives; so that we doubt whether it is likely to be singled out by the readers of a remoter future from among the many tributes to Cæsar and Cæsar-ism which our generation has produced."—Sat. "As Hamlet's father was sent by his unnatural brother to his grave with all his imperfections full upon him, so has Carlyle been recalled from his tomb by one who professes to have felt for him the love and veneration of a son, but who has performed by some marvellous perversion of judgment all that might have been looked for from his worst enemy. . . He (Carlyle) was a man of the most independent, honest character and of lofty thoughts, who would not for any worldly advantage abate one jot of his own standard of right and duty, essentially of a generous and kindly nature, a delightful companion, shming in society, a good son, a devoted brother, a really affectionate husband and friend, and the author of all those great contributions to English literature which have for so long placed him in the front rank of historians and essayists. This being so, why has every fault and weakness been traced with such loving insistence as to spare no ugly or repulsive detail? . . Why need every splenetic and hasty remark of scorn or condemnation spoken or found in the letters or journals have been preserved and printed for the misguidance of posterity? . . Why need the discomforts occasioned between him and his wife by what should have been a thoroughly useful and agreeable friendship be dwelt upon at such length and with so much zest? . . It is, of course, impossible to note all the matters of consequence and amusement in these pregnant volumes, which, with due expression of regret for the spirit in which it has seemed right to produce them, cannot be laid down without a deep feeling of their importance and surpassing interest."—Sat. an Index to Every Word therein contained, Phila., 1874, r. 8vo. (Contains also the text of the poems.)
"It would be hard to exaggerate Mrs. Furness's industry and faithfulness; and if we were to make any complaint about the book, it would be that layish care and industry had made it almost too good."—Nation, xviii. 412.
"This work supplies an undoubted want, and, we are happy to add, it supplies it in an admirable manner. . . It is a credit to herself, to her sex, and to her nation. Properly considered, it is a most valuable contribution to true Shakespearlan study, by the side of which much of what passes for Shakespearlan lore is shown in its full worthlessness."—Ath., No. 2446.

two more effective and inestimable helps to real Shakspearian criticism exist than the volumes for which we are so deeply indebted to Mrs. Cowden Clarke and Mrs. Horace Howard Furness. We welcome the newly-arrived one with the utmost heartiness. It is like the coming of a fresh breeze that will never cease to blow, to blow away the foolish phantasies that are perpetually issuing from the brains of ill-informed guess-mongers, to blow strength and vigour into all criticisms that are genuine births of knowledge and of sound and healthful judgment."—J. Furness, Horace Howard, Ph.D., LL.D., son of Rev. W. H. Furness, infra; b. 1833, in Philadelphia; graduated at Harvard 1854; admitted to the bar 1859; has devoted himself during many years to Shakespearian studies, and has accumulated materials for the illustration of the poet's works unrivalled probably in value and extent by any similar collection in America. The honorary degree of Ph.D. has been conferred upon him by the University of Göttingen, in recognition of his eminent services to Shakespearian literature. He is an active member of the board of trustees of the University of Pennsylvania. 1. (Ed.) A New Variorum Edition of Shakespeare: vol. i., Romeo and Juliet, Phila., 1871,

"That a new Variorum Shakespeare is wanted no one will be inclined to dispute. The last work of the kind ... appeared in 1821. In the half-century since then, Shakespearian studies have been carried on with constantly increasing activity. We have thus a Shakespearian literature wonderful for extent and variety. It is clearly time that some one should go through it, and present its substance in a condensed and acceptable form. ... This is the task—opus vere operosum—which Mr. Furness has undertaken. .. In deciding what to admit the editor has exercised a liberal judgment. He has preferred, with reason, to err on the side of fulness rather than of defect.

One aim of his work was to present a history of Shakereason, to err on the side of fulness rather than of defect. . . One aim of his work was to present a history of Shakespearian Interpretation: and for this it was necessary that imperfect or erroneous views should appear in it as well as the correct. . . . From a variety of indications we are satisfied that his self-imposed task has been executed with conscientious and unwearied fidelity."—Nation, xii. 307.

"So much has been done in the way of discovery and correction since the appearance of Malone's edition in 1821, that, if the American editor maintains throughout the work the spirit and industry which he has displayed in his first volume, he will furnish a new reference Shakespeare that, in bookseller's phrase, no library should be without."—Spectator, xilv. 801.

2. Vol. ii., Macbeth, 1873.

"It is impossible to criticise, within any reasonable limits, a volume so full of valuable matter. We can but repeat our expressions of welcone of this excellent American contribution to the study of our greatest poet, and give it our cordial approval."—Ath. No. 2389.

3. Vols. iii., iv., Hamlet, 1877, 2 vols.

"Hamlet' is in bulk double either of these, i' Romeo and Juliet' and 'Macbeth,'] and is doubtless the outcome of tenfold the labor. A variorum edition of it, harvesting and gleaning, as Mr. Furness does, the literature not only of England, but of Germany and France, and storing all away in two volumes of this size, might be the work of a lifetime. . . Mr. Furness has found it necessary to construct a text for himself by collation and comparison of the others. He has done it with admirable judgment and care, and given a good, conservative text in modern spelling and printing. . . Then come notes grammatical and explanatory. These are presented with admirable brevity and clearness, and are occasionally enlivened and enlightened by pithy remarks of the editor, all too few. . . The second volume, under the name of an appendix, presents the student with a collection of documents and critical discussions too extended to be placed in immericans.

diate connection with the text. . . . Most students would have been glad to see this volume larger, but all will recognize the excellent judgment with which the selections have been made and the fidelity and art of the translations. Beyond all question, the work furnishes important facilities for the study of this great poem."—F. A. Mach. Nation. xxv. 272.

"The present volumes abound in special difficulties of their own, not the least of which spring from the extraordinary number and extent of the discussions upon so many points connected with the play. A glance at the bibliography of 'Hamlet,' printed at the end of the second volume, would strike the nervelessness of despair into any editor not fortified by the intensest love of the author and of the work. . . Mr. Furness is to be congratulated on the completion of the most difficult, the most important, and the most interesting of all the volumes of his series." Spectator, 11. 249.

4. Vol. v., King Lear, 1880.

"Mr. Furness gives us the substance of a hundred volumes in one. It contains a critical text, with all the various readings and interpretations and explanatory notes from the beginning to the present time, with the criticisms and comments of all kinds, lexical, grammatical, esthetical, and the rest. Mr. Furness works with more ease and expresses his own opinions more freely than in his former volumes, and this is a gain. In an appendix there are discussions of the date of composition, the sources of the plot, the actors, the costume: extended passages of English, German, and French criticism; a good bibliography, and an index. . . . There is no book to be compared with it; it is indispensable to every student of Shaksper."—Nation, xxxi. 327.

"Slowly but surely the great task undertaken by America of providing an edition of Shakspeare authoritative as regards text and exhaustive in respect of comment advances. . . . It is pleasant to have in one volume the uterances of men like Coleridge, Johnson, Lamb, and other critics and commentators upon Lear, t

5. Vol. vi., Othello, 1886. (In this volume and the following the text is that of the first folio.)

"Mr. Furness's own opinions are always valuable. In the majority of cases he accepts the simplest reading. Now and then, dazzled as all appear to be who meet too earnestly and too long the rays of Shakspeare, he undergoes some apparent hallucination. As a rule, however, he is the surest as well as the most indefatigable of commentators and editors. The position of his work is already monumental."—Ath., No. 3069.

6. Vol. vii., The Merchant of Venice, 1888.

"The text of the first folio, pure and simple, with all its errors and difficulties, is accepted, and the various readings of the four folios and the four quartos, with those of subsequent editions, are given at the foot. This course is the most sensible that can be adopted. . . In the appendix, which occupies nearly half the volume, are given the materials bearing upon the date and origin of the plot, comments on the duration of the action, critical opinions, and much other matter of interest. . . Itke the previous volumes, this latest addition to the slowly-augmenting series is a model of scholarship and sanity, the latter a rarer gift in the case of Shakspearian editors than the former."—Ath. 7. Vol. viii., As You Like It, 1890.

"In what is called 'The Variorum Edition of Shakespeare,' America has the honour of having produced the very best and most complete edition, so far as it has gone, of our great national poet. For text, illustration, (happily not pictorial,) commentary, and criticism, it leaves nothing to be desired. The editor. . . combines with the patience and accuracy of the textual scholar an industry which has overlooked nothing of value that has been written about Shakespeare by the best German and French as well as English commentators and critics; and, what is of no less moment, he possesses in himself a rare delicacy of literavy appreciation and breadth of judgment, disciplined by familiarity with all that is best in the literature of antiquity as well as of modern times, which he brings to bear on his notes with great effect. . . It will say little for the intelligence of any one who chooses to profit by the labours of Mr. Furness over this play, if he does not rise from his book with a quickened appreciation of the dramatist's genius, and an intimate knowledge of the varied characters by which the action of the play is carried on."—Blackwood's Magazine, September, 1890.

"A book worth much, and yet not so good as a little more care and labor might have made it. . . Here are gathered from many sources and put in quite readable shape a large number of valuable tacts. . . . Of the twenty snape a large number of valuable facts. . . . Of the twenty chapters, one is given to the extinct mound-builders, thirteen to the history and present condition of the Indian tribes, and six to the history of the Northwestern States. The special value of the book is in the second part."—Nation, vi. 256.

During the greater part of this period he bore the assumed name of L. Mariotti, under which he published the works mentioned aute, vol. ii., and supported himself by teaching and by literature; but he subsequently adopted the profession of journalism, acting as special correspondent of the Times in Spain, Russia, &c., and as its leading editorial writer on foreign affairs, a position from which he retired in 1878. He was charge d'affaires for Picd-mont to the German Confederation 1848-49, and a member of the Piedmontese and of the Italian parliament 1854-64. 1. History of Piedmont, Lon., 1855, 3 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Francis Galton has bestowed immense pains upon the empirical proof of a thesis which from its intrinsic nature can never be proved empirically.... Until we can do infinitely more towards sorting the stores of man's mental growth and experience into what he brings into the

"That which strikes us as most noteworthy in this important contribution to English history is the clearness with which the book, as a whole, brings out a fact less habitually insisted upon than the constitutional significance of the Parliamentary struggles of those times. As the downfall of the personal authority of James I. had been due to the central and typical scheme of his foreign policy, so the failure of the foreign policy of Buckingham and Charles I. was an important element in the want of confidence which was the real cause of the overthrow of the Stuart monarchy."—Sal. "Mr. Gardiner does not encourage the dream that haunted the English mind through the first half of this century,—the dream of a grand epic narrative, a sort of Illad of English history, at the same time sublime and moral, of which Charles I., Strafford, Pym, Hampden, Falkland, and Cromwell should be the heroes. It is evident that he repudiates not only the party view of that period, but also the poetical view. He rejects alike the rhetoric of Macaulay and the poetry of Carlyle. He replaces their poetry by prose, and tells with scrupulous exactness a story which leaves us somewhat bewidered and rather saddened than animated. For Mr. Gardiner is scrious."—J. R. SEELEY: Acad, xxxi. 353.

"If the art of historical narration consists in so handling one's materials that the reader shall understand how they came to happen, Mr. Gardiner possesses the art in no common degree. Having a strong grasp of all the facts himself, he tells the complex story firmly, clearly, and coherently, dropping one thread for a time without forgetting it, and always bringing it in agalia at the right moment. From first to last the reader finds himself really interested, and can yet note that the interest is of that satisfactory and full-bodied kind which is produced, not by brilliant devices of style or eccentric methods, but by genuthe and orderly information as to men and events, communicated by one who has made himself at home among them through the records. The style is deliberate, grave, and manly, with mo sentence dull or purposeless, and every now and then a passage of energy and heightened tone. . . The only question is whether . . . his impartiality does not pass too much into the guise of unnecessary coolness. In the English past of two hundred and fifty years ago, if not at dates much farther back, may not the strictest modern historian discern the tendencies that had most of the right in them most of potential virtue and mobleness for the fu

Quatre Bras, Ligny, and Waterloo: a Narrative of the Campaign in Belgium, 1815, Bost., 1882, Svo.

"It is, perhaps, the most complete narrative of the Waterloo campaign that has yet appeared. It is, of course, in great measure a complation; . . . but it is well worked up, and the reader will find it no mere piece of mosale."—
Nation, XXXIV, 427.
"Not only a more parrative of the compagnet but also

Nation, XXXIV. 427.

"Not only a mere narrative of the campaign, but also an acute and exhaustive criticism has been culled by Mr. Gardner from the best authorities, and both have been well put together. . . . In order to thoroughly exhaust Waterloo Interature, Mr. Gardner devotes a chapter to 'Waterloo Poetry,' a good deal of which is sad stuff and might well have been omitted."—Ath., No. 2856.

"Although the treatise . . . is primarily a biography, and a very full and minute one, and although it is written with the reverential admiration of children rather than with the reverential admiration of children rather than from the point of view of a dispassionate and critical historian, it is also virtually a history of the anti-slavery struggle. . . It cannot be adequately dealt with till the later volumes are before us. . All that need now be done is to call attention to the mass of valuable materials which the biographers of Garrison have provided for historical inquirers. . . Nearly all appear in print for the first time. Many relate to forgotten controversies others serve chiefly to flustrate Garrison's character and that of his fellowworkers. But there are also many which throw a full and clear light on the condition of America, and especially of New England, five or six decades back."—James Bryce: Historical Review, No. 1.

Gaskell, Mrs. Elizabeth Cleghorn, 1810-1865, [ante, vol. i., add.,] b. in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, was not, as stated ante, vol. i., Miss Stromkin, but was the daughter of William Stevenson, (q. v., ante, vol. ii,) who at the time of her birth was keeper of the records to the treasury. Her mother having died in giving her birth, she was brought up by her aunt, Mrs. Lumb, at the village of Knutsford, in Cheshire,—the "Cranford" of her popular story of that name. After spending two years at a school at Stratford-on-Avon, she lived with her father till his death in 1829, and afterwards at Knutsford, till her marriage in 1832 to Rev. William Gaskell, a Unitarian minister of Manchester. Some years later she turned her attention to writing, and contributed an account of Clopton Hall to William Howitt's Remarkable Places, and some short stories to the People's Journal. After the publication of Mary Barton she visited London and made the acquaintance of Dickens and other literary men, and became a contributor to llousehold During the cotton famine in 1862 Mrs. Gaskell started sewing-schools for the female mill-hands, thus inaugurating a system of relief which was afterwards publicly adopted and proved of great benefit. death took place suddenly, of heart-disease, while staying at a house in Hampshire which she had recently bought as a present for her husband. Her novel Wives and Daughters, which was coming out at the time in serial form, was left unfinished. The following list of her works includes those mentioned ante, vol. i., where dates, &c., are not given: 1. Mary Barton: a Tale of Manchester Life, Lon., 1848, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Anon. very high place among those who are comparatively unambitious in their efforts, and who, having a just measure of their own powers, succeed perfectly in what they undertake. She never attempted high flights, but pursued her way steadily and surely at a moderate elevation. Her style has not the magnificent reach of her friend Charlotte Bronté: it is homely, as suited her subjects. It was natural that art such as hers, working earnestly within a definite field, without straining to get beyond it, and never wasting its strength against the precipices, should become more perfect as she went on... To the last she was best known as the authoress of 'Mary Barton'... But in her later novels, 'Sylvia's Lovers' and 'Wives and Daughters,' in which she let the manufacturing towns behind her and essayed to describe less oppressive and painful conditions of life, though she cannot be said to have improved upon the completeness and vividness of her separate portruits, she showed greater art in the management of her story...

"It is a new story, which it was impossible to tell even a few years ago with anything like accuracy, simply because the original evidences had not been made sufficiently accessible. or comprehensively catalogued in true chronological order. But, although the author is a monk, and dedicates his work to Pope Leo XIII., by whom, it appears, he was induced to undertake it, he need fear no contradiction hereafter on the main point here revealed. The old scandals, universally discredited at the time, and believed in by a later generation only through prejudice and ignorance, are now dispelled forever, and no candid Protosta

"If Mr. Geddes has been fired by the honourable ambition of worthily carrying on the thread of Mr. Motley's labours, the conception of the 'History of the Administration of John de Witt' is not the less its author's own, and his grasp of the general European history of the times with which he deals is, to say the least, as vigorous as that exhibited in the rather disappointing second volume of the 'Life and Death of John of Barneveld.' We cannot, however, suppress a wish that Mr. Geddes had not thought it necessary to imitate Mr. Motley—or rather, perhaps, the inimitable old master who is primarily responsible for the fashion to which we refer—in adopting the familiarly picturesque style of historical composition. . . For English readers this volume is likely to possess a unique interest, centring in its narrative of what may assuredly be termed the strangest diplomatic negotiation into which this country has ever entered with a foreign power. We do not know whither else to turn for so plain and succinct an account as that furnished in Mr. Geddes's pages of the great Protestant and Republican scheme of an Anglo-Dutch coalition."—Sat. Rev. xlix. 283.

"We feel, with Mr. Geddes, that 'if there had been a Boswell by' De Witts' 'slde, or a chatty French memoirwriter, we should have seen it all very differently.' As there was not, we think it a plty that so good a writer should have wasted his time on such an unprofitable subject."—Spectator, lint. 336.

Archibald Geikie, supra; received a similar education to his brother's; served on the Geological Survey of Scotland from 1861 to 1882, and was then appointed Murchison professor of geology and mineralogy in Edinburgh University. He has prepared many geological maps and reports for the Geological Survey. 1. The

"It is Mr. Geikie's plan to blend in one great result the special evidences which have been adduced by geologists and archeologists to prove the great antiquity of our race. The larger part of the work is naturally devoted to the phenomena of glacial action, as shown by a careful study of the deposits. . . His studies have now brought his mind to the conclusion that none of the palreolithic series of gravels are post-glacial, but that all must be relegated to pre-glacial or inter-glacial times. . . His book will mark an epoch in the scientific study of the Ice Age."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 247, 312. xxxvii. 247, 812.

"In 'Prehistoric Europe' Professor Geikie goes necessarily over much of the ground traversed not long ago by Professor Boyd Dawkins in 'Prehistoric Man in Britain,' the wider scope of the survey bringing at the same time more systematically under view the relations between our existing island group and the continent of which it once no doubt formed a part. The general agreement between these eminent palæontologists may be taken by the public at large as a sufficient testimony to the solidity of the basis on which has been built up the comparatively recent science of prehistoric archæology, and to the trustworthiness both of the materials and the methods which have been combined to make up the fabric."—Sal. "Mr. George endeavors to show that the cause, or principal cause, of poverty and wretchedness in the midst of wealth and abundance in the world is the private ownership of land, whereby a few persons are enabled to exact from the many a rental for the use of something which is limited in quantity and indispensable to the human race.

Although we have to consider Mr. George's positions essentially unsound, we find many admirable passages, and a notable spirit of candor pervading his work. The style is for the most part engaging, and often eloquent. So far from being a work of communistic tendencies, the reader will find in it arguments to overthrow nearly all the communist theories of the present day."—Nation, xxxi. 65, 117.

"This is 'Progress and Poverty' over again, with less argument and more passion, less political economy and more tirade and bombast. We do not underestimate the evils which Mr. George depicts, but his remedy for them is as worthless and futile as it would be atroctous if it could be carried into execution. . . In his present work he advocates woman suffrage, and frankly avows socialistic views. . . Mixed up with all his absurdites there are dashes of sturdy good sense in all Mr. George's writings. . . . Barring a few slight blemishes of duction, ('will' for 'shall' etc.) his style is in every respect admirable. His method of developing a subject greatly resembles that of Herbert Spencer; . . but Mr. George's style is fresher and more brilliant."—Nation. xxxviii. 237, and xxxix. 294.

"Throughout his book there runs a vein of cheerful optimism; of the cynlcism and scepticism which mark so many of the revolutionary class there is scarcely a trace. Nor can we agree with those who think that Mr. George's pet idea, which here reappears, of the nationalization of land by the confiscation of rent, is a dangerous one. In a country like ours such a proposal is so extravagant and unpractical that it may be dismissed as harmless. The rend danger seems to be . . . that the colossal blunder of Mr. George may hide from us the valuable truths or suggestions of truth that may undoubtedly be found in the book."—Acad. xxv. 87.

"Mr. George is the master of a clear and vigorous style, and although he looks almost exclusively at the darker side of things, although his denunciations of modern society are unduly severe, his facts often unfairly stated, and his deductions generally absurd, many of his observations are not without warrant; and it is perhaps well that we should be reminded, even in

7. Protection or Free Trade: an Examination of the Tariff Question: with Especial Regard to the Interests of Labour, N. York and Lon., 1886, 12mo.

"The most interesting parts of his book are the chapters in which he explains where the real strength of protection lies; it is in the assumption that 'the getting of work, not the getting of the result of work, is the end to which national policy should be directed. In following out this idea he discusses the matter in a way that is both fresh and suggestive."—Ath., No. 3065.

"Mr. Gilbert seems to have spent some time in consulting the public records of Ferrara, and especially those which have reference to the life and times of Lucrezia Borgia: and his labour has resulted in a curious picture of the city as it was between three and four centuries ago, and a very interesting study of the character of a princess who has hitherto found but few champions. The idea originally thrown out by Mr. Roscoe, in his 'Dissertation on the Character of Lucredia Borgia,' has been fully worked out by Mr. Gilbert, who has at least succeeded in proving that the beautiful toxicologist of the stage has very little in common with the Lucrezia Borgia of history."—Sct. Legion; or, The Modern Demoniac, Lon., 1882, p. 8vo. "He is a story-teller sui generia, with a very poculiar tendency towards minute analysis of morbid and exceptional mental processes. Yet he never seems to analyze any mood or mental condition for its own sake simply; and we are therefore compelled to see in him the professed moralist with a leaning towards hard psychological phenomena, in which he finds a ready justification for his didactic purpose. . . The fusing power is what Mr. Gilbert is most lacking in. He sees his whole subject clearly enough from the pseudo-scientific ground, but he does not so see it from the elevated table-land of the imagination. . All Mr. Gilbert's books are full of exquisite pictures and individual points, which are vastly unlike those found in the books of any one else."—Contemp. Rev., xii. 437-444.

at last been done to the memory of one whose natural gifts qualified him apparently to rank amongst the greatest of English artists. Mr. Gilchrists book both tells the singular story of Blake's life, for the first time, with fulness and with a judgment which is rarely at fault, and by its numerous and faithful filustrations enables the reader more merous and fatthful filustrations enables the reader more or less to make acquaintance with the artist. . The book is written in a clear, vigorous, unconventional style; it is as amusing as a romance, and we have few recent Lives in which the facts have been more carefully collected, presented with less parade, or arranged in such lucid order. The catalogue of drawings which has been added by Mr. William Rossetti is a model of what is an indispensable adjunct to an artist's life."—Sat. Rev., xvi. 630.

3. Historical Sketches of Savage Life in Polynesia: with Illustrative Clan Songs, Wellington, New Zealand, 1880, 8vo.

"It is not, perhaps, so generally interesting as his previous work, the very remarkable 'Myths and Songs from the South Pacific,"—a collection of antiquities, to use the words of Professor Max Muller, 'showing us, far better than any stone weapons or stone idols, the growth of the human mind during a period which as yet is full of the most perplexing problems to the psychologist, the historian, and the theologian.' The 'Historical Sketches' deal with the rough realities more than with the picturesque fictions of savage life, and the work is somewhat monotonous in its records of sacrifices to flerce gods, its legends of internecine feuds, and its chronicles of cannibalism. But the testimony it bears has the great merit of being quite trustworthy; and Mr. Gill has done very good service by placing on record the heathenish traditions which must before long fade from the memories of the Christian descendants of the fierce islanders to whom they relate."—Sat. Rev. 1.

of the heree handers to the fell of the heree handers as its predecessor. Preface.
"There is great inequality in Mr. Gladstone's execution of his undertaking. On some parts of it he has bestowed the greatest pains, and his views are undoubtedly worthy of the deepest consideration, while on others he has apparently taken up the slight conjectures of others, and applied to them toosmall a share of the extraordinary powers of his own mind."—Sat. article that appeared in the Quarterly Review for January, 1875.)

"The real thing which Mr. Gladstone objects to is not the doctrine that the Catholic faith on any disputed point of pure theology may be ascertained from a declaration (uttered under certain conduitions) by the Pope, instead of the cumbrous machinery, used probably for the last time in 1870, of a group of hundreds of bishops summoned away for months from their diocesses to be cajoled into voting straight; he is shocked at finding that English and Irish, French and American, German and Italian Catholics are to be bound in conscience to obey the orders of an Italian Court, in certain matters about which the Governments of their own countries give, or claim the power to give, contradictory orders."—W. At any rate, he has favoured the world with a clear, spirited, and judicious lite of one whose memory will ever be honoured by those who trace back to him and to men like-minded with him the first germs of that spiritual revival in England which, with all lis drawbacks, has proved the source of happiness to thousands, and has powerfully affected for good our national life and character."—Sat. Godkin, Georgina Sarah, daughter of James Godkin, infra. 1. Life of Victor Emmanuel II., First King of Italy, Lon. and N. York, 1879, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The writer's admiration for the truly kingly qualities of Victor Emmanuel amounts almost to the loyalty of a subject, which an evidently long residence in Italy has fostered. . . . The permanent value of this biography lies in its extracts from the chief Italian memoirs on the period as extracts from the effect farmin memors on the period under survey; . . . while its interest is secured by a good assortment of anecdotes."—Nation, xxix. 231.

"He has succeeded in compressing into the limits of two very handy volumes all the principal events of the public life of the late King of Italy. . . . His work is very far from being duil."—Spectator, lii. 1253

2. The Monastery of San Marco, Florence, 1885, 8vo. The Religious History of Ireland, Primitive, Papal, and Protestant: including the Evangelical Missions, Catholic Agitations, and Church Progress of the Last Half-Century, Lon., 1873, 8vo.

"The book is disfigured throughout by the practice of filling the pages with scraps from other writers... Mr. Godkin treats the three rival communions with praiseworthy impartiality, and is ready to do justice to good and zealous men in all three alike... He is strong in behalf of the National system and the Queen's Colleges... Mr. Godkin is much better employed in speaking of these later matters, which he has clearly looked at with much care, than in puzzling his brain about Cuthites and Fir-Bolgs."—Sci. Rev. xxxvi. 411.

"Mr. Godkin's book is in no wise to be relied on....

Military Academy; received his commission in the Royal Engineers in 1852; served in the Crimean war; joined the allied army in China in 1860, and in 1862-63, in command of a small force of natives, and recruits of all nations, known as the "Ever-Victorious Army," succeeded in suppressing the Taiping robellion. Returning to England, he was appointed commanding royal engineer at Gravesend in 1865; in 1871-72 he acted as commissioner of the Danube at Galatz; in 1874 he was appointed by the Khedive governor of the Soudan tribes, a post which he resigned in 1876, but returned in 1877 as governor-general of the Soudan and the Equatorial Provinces. In 1880 he was appointed secretary to Lord Ripon in India, but resigned soon after reaching Bombay, and went to Hong-Kong on the invitation of the Chinese government to assist in bringing about an understanding between that country and Russia. He was appointed commanding royal engineer at Mauritius in 1881, major-general in the army and commander-in-chief of the Cape forces in 1882, visited Palestine in 1883, and in January, 1884, was sent as British envoy to Khartoum, and reappointed by the Khedive governor-general of the Soudan, with directions to bring away the garrisons beamined in by the insurrectionists under the Mahdi. For three bundred and thirty-seven days he was shut up in Khartoum with scant provisions and a small and discontented garrison, and while the forces finally sent by the English government for his relief were on their way, Gordon was killed and the town Ner were on their way, Gordon was killed and the town surrendered. "Technically speaking, Mr. Gosse's 'New Poems' might be classed as idyls and lyrics; but the lyrical element preponderates. His songs, as a rule, are the expression of emotion rather than of pussion. . . It is one great charm of these verses that they seem to come to the poet uncalled, to be the natural and necessary expression of his mood. Yet natural as they are—so natural that, granted the intensity of emotion, the musical utterance follows like a logical conclusion—the artistic expression is never neglected."—Sat. "The lectures published in this volume were delivered by Mr. Gosse as Clark Lecturer of Trinity College, Cambridge, . . . and they also have been read before several racademic audiences in America. . . Mr. Gosse expresses the hope that he has been able to show that the classical movement was not a stupid decline into dulness, but that it was an absolute necessity, if English poetry was to exist, that a period of executive severity and attention to form should succeed the hysterical riot of the Jacobeaus. The process by which this conclusion is reached will interest every reader of poetry. . "The author of a compendious history of any kind should mentally address himself to two opposite classes of possible readers,—namely, those who are utterly ignorant should mentally address himself to two opposite classes of possible readers,—namely, those who are uterly ignorant of the subject of which he treats, and those to whom it is perfectly familiar... Messrs. Gostwick and Harrison have very carefully consuited the wants of the two opposite classes to which we have referred, and consequently of the various classes which may be ranged on a graduated scale from one extreme to the other. —Sat. JEANIE T., (GOULD,) infra.
Gould, John, F.R.S., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1804-1881. The catalogue of scientific papers compiled by the Royal Society shows that up to 1873 there had been two hundred and twenty-nine contributed by Gould, and this number was afterwards considerably increased. his vast collection of birds and maminals, the Australian birds are in the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, and the humming-birds and Australian mammals in the South Kensington Museum. His books, which include more than forty folio volumes, now command enhanced prices for the beauty of their illustrations as well as for the value of the text. Most of them were originally published in parts. Add to the list given ante, vol. 1: 1. A Monograph of the Trochilides, or Family of Humming-Birds, 1849-61, 5 vols. imp. fol. Separate volume, entitled "An Introduction to the Trochilides, or volume, completed by R. Bowdler Sharpe, 1886. 2. The Birds of Asia, Lon., 1850-83, 7 vols. imp. fol. (Vol. vii. was completed by R. B. Sharpe.) 3. The Birds of Great Britain, Lon., 1862-73, 5 vols. (25 parts) imp. fol. In the final volume the author writes in reference to the illustrations in his works,-

"Many of the public are quite unaware how the colouring of these large plates has been accomplished, and not a few believe that they are produced by some mechanical process, or by chromo-lithography. This, however, is not the case: every sky with its varied tints, and every feather of each bird, were coloured by hand; and when it is considered that nearly two hundred and eighty thousand illustrations in the present work have been so treated, it will cause some astonishment to those who give the subject a thought."

4. The Mammals of Australia, Lon., 1863, 3 vols. imp. l. (The publication of this work in parts was begun in 1845, and parts i. and ii. are mentioned ante, vol. i.)

"Worthy to take its place as a companion to what we consider as the most complete of all Mr Gould's undertakings. 'The Birds of Australia.' and the mammals of that distant land are now better illustrated, and their strange outlines more nearly brought home to us, as we turn over his magnificent plates, than those even of Europe itself."—Sait. Rev., xvii. 28.

"More than one of the chapters in these anything but dull volumes, which begin with the nobility, upper and lower, and end with a brief discourse on the stove, furnish abundant evidence that the author might have written a valuable as well as entertaining book had he but carefully followed the method clearly indicated by himself.

followed the method clearly indicated by himself.... Our charge against him is only that of over-haste."—Sat. Rev. xlviii. 664.

"This work consists of a great deal of padding and a little original matter. The padding is from well-known, trustworthy German sources, and would be instructive enough in the hands of an author with a sufferable style, and sufficient personal command of his subject to allow him to make an intelligent use of his materials.... With care and patience he might help to scatter the utter dark, ness prevalent among us with respect to Germany. His present work is not much more accurate, and it is less amusing, than the 'Pays des Milliards' of M. Tissot, which at least has all the merits of a regular caricature."—Acad., xvi. 385.

"He is never dry; he is never tedious. He is seldom wrong in his facts, still seldomer wrong in his inferences. If you let him take you by the hand, and follow his lead confidingly, you will get a very good bird's-eye view of a vast subject. But it is, after all, only a bird's-eye view."—Spectator, lilli. 626. NOTICES OF MR. BARING-GOULD'S NOVELS:

"Wild, singular, extraordinary, as the conceptions and combinations of the author of 'Mehalah' are, they are almost if not entirely removed from the realm of imagination. It is on this fact, as we believe, that their value and their chance of endurance as literature rest. The stories of English rural life which have followed 'Mehalah' and their chance of endurance as literature rest. The stories of English rural life which have followed 'Mehalah' form each in its way bits of human history, studies of eccentric development, scenes from the comedy of unsophisticated life, which have an interest different from what we accord to the flights of more exclusively imaginative writers,"—Sat. Ren., Livt. 667.

"Of our eight or ten living novelists of merit, few have greater ability than Mr. Baring-Gould. His characters are bold and forcible figures, his wit is as ready as his figures of speech are apt. He has a powerful imagination, and is quantly fanciful. When he describes a storm one can see his trees breaking in the gale. So enormous and accurate is his general information that there is no trade or profession with which he does not seem to be familiar. So far as scientific knowlege is concerned, he is obviously better equipped than any contemporary writer of fiction. Yet one rises from his books with a feeling of repulsion, or at least with the glad conviction that his Ignoble views of life are as untrue as the characters who illustrate them. Here is a melancholy case of a novelist, not only clever but sincere, undone by want of sympathy."—J. M. Barrie: Contemporary Rev., February, 1890.

"I propose in the following pages to give the chief conclusions reached by nodern science in the central questions of religion, morals, and society,—to state, in a word, the general creed of science; and as the scientific faith may still be fallible, or of unequal degrees of credit, I propose, in the second place, to offer some comments and criticisms on some of its more doubtful articles, with a view to their reconsideration or revision,"—Author's Preface.

"This volume shows in a very able as well as very interesting manner the poverty of the higher philosophy of the men of physical science, and the absolute need for something better than they can give us as the supplement of their own science, which is so excellent in itself. But it is a pity that the author, in his desire for maintaining close sympathy with the men of science, should have been so terribly afraid of being taken for a Christian."—Spectator, liv. 1194.

3. The Social Problem in its Economical, Moral, and Political Aspects, Lon., 1886, 8vo.

Political Aspects, Lon., 1886, Svo.

"With terrific power he depicts the purgatorial pains of poverty... What are his remedies? They are twofold,—general and special. The most comprehensive prescription is to 'try and see what justice, the great and almost the only social virtue, is, and where it lies.'... Unlike so many who have looked into the depths of the social abyss, he has not been seized with an intellectual vertigo. He has the moral earnestness without the bogus value-theory of Marx; the burning eloquence without the glaring fallacies of Henry George... One feels that Prof. Graham may be the ablest living advocate of socialism; one wishes that he were less of an advocate and more of a judge."—F. Y. EDGEWORTH: Acad., XXX. 50.

"Looked at simply as material for the American historical magnum opus of the future, probably nothing will be reckoned more important, certainly nothing can be more interesting on the military side, than this plain narrative, by a plain, but observant, veracious, and resolutely impartial, man. . . . General Grant writes a simple, American-Saxon style."—Spectator, lix. 392.
"It cannot be too carefully remembered . . . that the chief value of the book must be in the revelation of Grant's own character, feelings, judgments, and modes of thinking. It is both valuable and interesting as making us know him better than we knew him before; but, regarded as history, all the circumstunces under which it was writand bedeet than we knew him before; but, regarded as history, all the circumstances under which it was written precluded the possibility of that critical testing of memory and comparison of voluminous documents without which not even so prominent an actor on the world's stage can safely claim to write the history of his own time."—Nation, xliii. 12.

The real value of this book is to be sought not in the charm of a brilliant style, or the surprising width of the knowledge it exhibits, or the vividness of the portraiture, or the sublicty with which some legal and constitutional questions are handled, but in the masterly manner in which the main object has been kept in view from first to last, and, though nothing in the history of his reign has been slurred over, everything has been subordinated to the setting forth the statesmuship of the king."—4th.. In 1860 he took his degree and was ordained. He became curate of St. Barnabas, King's Square, E.C., London, and was afterwards vicar of St. Philip's, Stepney. His health, always delicate, was seriously impaired by the labors of an East London parish, and particularly by his exertions during the cholera outbreak of 1867, and this fact, together with intellectual difficulties in regard to his position, led him to resign his parish for literary occupation. In 1868 he was made librarian to the Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth. For some years he wrote regularly for the Saturday Review, and contributed to other periodicals. His two latest works were written in the midst of a hopeless struggle with consumption. 1. A Short History of the English People: with Maps and Tables, Lon., 1874, p. 8vo. "The secret of this extraordinary success it is not difficult to divine. Mr. Green's style is eminently readable and attractive. A lively imagination, not always under the most rigid control, imparts its own colours to the dry details of history, where a more scrupulous or conscientious writer would have wearied himself, and fatgued his readers, unwilling to venture beyond the arid region of facts.

If in some parts of his work we trace the conscientious sudy and examination of original authorities, in others he has trusted exclusively to recondary sources, attempting little more than a reproduction, after his own fashion, without exercising much independent judgment, and not always with rigid accuracy, of the opinions and conclusions of his predecessors."—J. Revolution, 1660-1688. Vol. iv., The Revolution, 1688-1760: Modern England, 1760-1815.

"Though the materials of the earlier book [the "Short History of the English People"] have been woven into it, and though we recognize many of the most brilliant passages as old friends, still the arrangement is so altered, and the amount of fresh matter is so large, that it is substantially a new work. . . . Almost the whole of the constitutional part has been rewritten in accordance with the views of Professor Stubbs. . . . Moreover, he has to some extent clipped the wings of his imagination, which in the earlier work sometimes took rather lofty flights. In short, the new book, while retaining the life and sparkle of its predecessor, is better proportioned, calmer in tone, and altogether a more ripe and complete piece of work. . . . Mr Green's belief in the rights of conscience is so strong that he can give due meed of admiration alike to the Protestant martyrs and confessors under Elizabeth; but it is at the same time neither with Protestant nor Romanust that his own sympathies lie. His heart is with the men who may be looked upon as the spiritual ancestors of the 'advanced thinkers' of our own day,—with the group of scholars of the 'New Learning,' among whom Colet, Erasmus, and More stand pre-eminent. . . The care and pains with which Mr. Green has traced the various currents of religious thought can hardly be too highly praised. . . . Taking a general survey of the four volumes, we should be inclined to say that Mr. Green has traced mean can be equally in sympathy with all centuries, and, on the whole, the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries form the period with which Mr. Green has least in common."—Sct. Rev., XIV. 44, 745, 813; XIV. 661; I. 214.

"Mr. Green has recovered the lost art of historical narration. This is his peculiar tule to fame, and it is one which no contemporary English or American writer shares with him. . Impartial critics must, in estimating the causes of Mr. Green's success, add that he exhibi

"It is difficult to criticise a book which we have no opportunity of judging as a whole. It follows as a matter of course that this volume cannot be placed upon the same level with 'The Making of England.' But we can see that there were materials here that might have made it as successful, and would probably have made it even more popular than the previous one. As it stands, it is necessarily open to criticism upon many points."—Sat. Rev., lvi.

"The most able and remarkable contribution to ethical science which has appeared in our country since the publication of Professor Sidgwick's 'Methods of Ethics'.

It is the work of a mind of great power, although difficult to read in a measure far exceeding what is rendered necessary by the views of the writer and the subjects of which he treats."—Spectator, Ivi. 1283, 1316.

"The simplicity and lucidity of the style are especially admirable when the complexity of much of the subject-matter is considered; the stream of argument is almost everywhere as clear as it is deep. From the entangled confusion, the Germanized jargon, the engrammatic paradox, which render some metaphysical works insufferable, this treatise is entirely free. . . Ascent of Mount Cook. Illust. Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"As interesting as any record of difficulties overcome by courage and skill that Australian travel has yet produced. It tells how the writer, with two Swiss guides, made the ascent of Mount Cook. . . . The book must necessarily be one of primary interest to the mountaineer.
As a contribution to our knowledge of New Zealand as a home for the superfluous population of the Old World, its value is necessarily slight."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 457.

"Of the four parts into which the work is . . . divided, the first . . . is a literal compilation (with brief résumés) from Russian official books on the recruiting, organization, armament, administration, and tactics of the army; the third, . . . a short sketch of the campaign in Armenia, based on no personal observation by the author; and the fourth, . . . on the defence and attack of fortified positions, interesting only to specialists; the second part, . . . on the campaign in Bulgaria, forms the main portion of the whole, the most valuable to the general public, as it is the most extensive and interesting."—Natura, xxix. 227.

"One of the most important contributions to military history which have appeared for many years. . . The book, as Lieutenant Greene admits,—and as perhaps was only natural from the kind reception he received,—has a bias towards the Russian side, a stronger bias, indeed, than the writer is aware of; but the aim at impartiality is as clear as the spirit of accuracy and the painstaking ability which have been brought to bear on the compilation."—Sat. In 1848 the family gave up Greenwell Ford, owing to reverses of fortune, and after her father's death Miss Greenwell settled at Durham with her mother in 1851, and lived there till 1872. The last years of her life were passed chiefly in London and at Clifton. She was a constant contributor to Good Words and other periodicals, and took an ardent interest in works of benevolence, particularly in the efforts made for the care and improvement of the feeble-minded. of Virginia to the Reconstruction of the Union, Lon., 1887, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Greg's history falls into three main divisions, or at least there are three successive portions of his subject which stand out conspicuously: 1) The early history of the New England Puritans; (2) the War of Independence, and (3) the War of Secession. On each of these matters he is an earnest partisan. Mr. Greg detests and condemns New England Puritans, American rebels, Northern abolitionists and their allies. ... Every character, every incident, is so dealt with as to illustrate the righteousness of one cause, the unrighteousness of the other. . . It is the more to be regretted that Mr. Greg should have chosen to write a partisan pamphlet instead of a history, because he has gifts which might have fitted him to play the better part. He sees his subject as a whole clearly and comprehensively; his style, though at times disfigured by rather vague rhetoric, is for the most part lucid and effective; his arrangement and grouping of incidents methodical; his narrative concise."—J. A. Deyle: Acad., xxxi. 267

"After half a volume of it, the reader who does not begin as a blind partisan finds himself sympathizing with the victims of all this scolding, even though he is naturally inclined to lean to Mr. Greg's own side . . The statesmanship, the wisdom, the culture, the valour, the chivalry, the lofty refined courtesy of the South are insisted on till one longs for the suppression of these immaculate creatures."—Scd. Rev., 1xtii. 421.

"It does not contain a particle of original research; it does not bring to light a single document, letter, note, or order. . . . Its animus is mischlevous,—to arouse ill-feeling between America and England, and awaken resentments between the North and the South. . . One would suppose that a novelist writing a history would at least make it entertaining; but there is not a picturesque description, a graphic narration, a fine personal characterization, in the two volumes."—Nation, xivi. 140.

Mafter accompanying him through his opening chapters, we shall probably feel that our mental horizon has been widened, and we shall certainly feel that Mr. Greg has added fresh interest to his subject."—Nat. "Mr. Greg has never written a more eloquent book than this, and never any so full of deep religious feeling, in spite of its deep underlying doubt, but a good many of lus readers will perhaps agree with us that he has added one to the deeper 'Enigmas of Life' by his discourses on them, rather than taken anything from their enigmatic character."—Spectator, xlv. 1627.

"The last words of a man of independent and vigorous judgment, who formed his opinions for no other man's pleasure, and was wholly indifferent whether what he said found favour with the great body of his hearers or with any party among them."—Sat. Rev., liii. 180.

"It was Greg's especial function to discourage unreasonable expectations from political or even social reforms, to impress his readers with the infinite complexity of modern problems, and in general to caution democracy against the abuse of its power. His apprehensions may sometimes appear visionary, and sometimes exaggerated, but are in general the previsions of a far-seeing man, acute in observing the tendencies of the age, though perhaps too ready to identify tendencies with accomplished facts."—Dict. of Nat. "Those who study English satirical prints of the last century are indebted to Mr. Grego for the share he took in the comprehensive monograph on James Gillray which appeared some years ago. Of this the two attractive volumes before us form the complement... Of course a great deal of the letter-press is descriptive of, and supplementary to, the excellent photographic fac-similes of Rowlandson's drawings... Much historical matter remained to be expounded, and it is in dealing with it that our author's industry has been most profitably exercised. At any rate, he has gathered for the world plenty of amusing materials."—4th., No. 2752.

"A history not of facts pure and simple, but of popular opinion on matters political, as it showed itself in contemporary English satirical prints. . . . Extraordinarily interesting as Mr. Grego's book is, attractive and extremely amusing as are its hundreds of illustrations, we must not expect from them the truth, or all the truth, and nothing but the truth, "-1th., No. 3089.

"It is rather a collection of election caricatures, and ancedotes of striking incidents in some famous elections, than a connected history. . . In spite of its somewhat irritating faults, the book is interesting and amusing."

Greville, Charles Cavendish Fulke, 17941865, eldest son of Charles and Lady Charlotte Greville, and grandson of the fifth Lord Warwick and of the third Duke of Portland; was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he took no degree, and from 1821 to 1860 was clerk of the Privy Council. Throughout that period he was in intimate relations with the leaders of both political parties, and saw much of the interior of court life. 1. The Precedence Question, Lon., 1840, 8vo.

a Journal of the Reigns of King George 1v. and King William IV. Edited by Henry Reeve. Lon., 1874, 3 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1875.

"No equally important contribution to the political history of the last generation has been made by any previous writer. Perhaps the only passage in the published portion of the Memoirs which could at present cause any offence is a probably unfounded charge against a lady who is still alive of having had thick ankles in her youth."—Sat. Queen Victoria, from 1837 to 1852, Lon., 1885, 8 vols. 8vo.

"His sketches of character are sometimes almost worthy of St. Simon, whom he had probably studied with care, and they are the more valuable, though they may be less superficially consistent, because he often describes the same person more than once on varying occusions and in different moods of his own mind."—Sal. Rev., 1x. 646.

"Readers who expect to find in the second instalment of 'The Greville Memoirs'... so many and such spley bits of scandal as the previous three volumes contained will be disappointed.... It must be added that there is quite enough candid chronicling and sharp criticism in these volumes to make them amusing even to those who do not read them especially for the solid information they contain and the valuable side-lights they throw on the personal and general history of the time."—Ath., No. 3026.

5. The Greville Memoirs: a Journal of the Reign of Queen Victoria, 1852-60, 1887, 2 vols, 8vo.

"The completion of Mr. Greville's journals is a considerable literary event. From first to last they cover a period of forty years; and few English memoirs have been so copious, so exact, so well informed, or so incisive. In some respects this instalment lags behind the others. There are but few stories.... There are fewer portraits... There is little scandal, and the pages are almost exclusively occupied with political events.... On the other hand, these volumes bring us within reach of our own times, and what they lose in piquancy they gain in personal interest.... This record is one of the most valuable and interesting political books of the century."—Acad., xxxi. 69.

"He was pecullarly well informed on the most secret ransactions of contemporary politics. He spared no pains in completing his information, recorded it with great freshness and perfect impartiality, and frequently revised his diarles. These characteristics, coupled with the brilliant portraits which he draws of his contemporaries, make his diarles the most important work of

"After Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophical admiration, Lord Coleridge's polished though rather undiscriminating panegyric, Mr. Arnold's cautious appreciation, and Mr. Irving's self-advertising praise, it was, perhaps, well that some student of the people and institutions of the United States should raise his voice in criticism and censure. ... "Mr. Griffis has given us a panoramic view of Japanese history, bringing into prominence many of the most important periods. He accompanies this with a running commentary, which is enlivened by the fact that it is the language of one who, living among the people, has attempted to unravel the causes of recent events in the light of the past. . . . The whole book bears evidences of being the work of an intelligent and thoughtful observer, who was determined to be impartial; and it is undoubtedly the most important contribution that has appeared with regard to Japan."—Nation, xxiii. 316.

"By his title, 'Echoes,' Mr. Grindon explains that he does not mean resemblances, such as are the basis of popular nomenclature or scientific classification. but, as he expresses it, 'resonances from things of another substance,' the action of which he illustrates, in his own style, 'by the tree in the ancient forest calling to the blosson on the hills, and the fern in the dale calling to the weed on the beach.' These echoes or resonances he teaches us to apprehend in the general aspect and figure of plants, in their leaf, flower, bracts and calyces, stamens and pistils, fruit, seed, colour, and odours: ... and under whichsever of these heads we test his principles and research, we shall find equal ground for satisfaction."—Sat. and Aquatint Illustrations from Contemporary Sources, by Joseph Grego; each in duplicate, one on plate paper, remarque proofs, the other on Whatman paper, coloured by hand; limited ed., Lon., 1888, 2 vols. r. 8vo.

"Gronow was not exactly a Tallemant des Réaux, but he had many of the qualities possessed by that prince of anecdote, and there is no more delightful reading than the pages in which he restores the society of seventy years ago, or those in which we can read of the glories of the Second Empire and its Court."—Sat. Rev., 1xvi. 622.

"When he relates his personal experiences, as in his accounts of the state of Paris in 1815, the condition of society in London in his own time, and the doings of the court of Napoleon III., his testimony is to be relied on, but his second-hand stories and anecdotes of persons whom he did not know are of little value."—Dict. of Nat. "He has not given us any systematic exposition of the Platonic philosophy; he has not devoted even a single chapter to the general estimate of Plato's doctrines and a statement of their place in the history of thought. He has been content to follow the Protean philosopher through the mazes of each dialogue, sometimes translating long passages word for word, more often giving a sort of running analysis of the substance, and in both cases interspersing from time to time his own comments and criticisms.

Every one who opens his book can see that it is the work of a powerful mind which, having set before itself a high ideal of perfection, has thought no pains too great to be expended in carrying out his scheme."—Sat. Rev., xx. 84.

"It is exceedingly readable,—more than readable, entertaining... The contrast between Mr. Grote's quiet, simple, and scholarly letters, full of the work he was upon or the public events of the day, and Mrs. Grote's somewhat strong-minded personal sallies and badinage, has something of the effect of horseradish sauce with roast becf. We should tike the book better with much less loudness of tone; but perhaps we might not read it with so much curiosity and amusement."—Spectator, xivi. 638.

"Mrs. Grote's work is almost an autoblography of her husband, and probably he could not himself have composed it with equal fidelity and force."—Sal. Rev., xxxv. 785.

"With all his depth of thought and keenness of observation, the author adds little or nothing to what every musician of ordinary attainments must know as the result of his own experience. The problem of the effect of musical phenomena on the mind is not made lighter by the manner in which it is here approached."—Ath., No. 2813.

"The preface states that its chief object is 'to examine, in such a way as a person without special technical knowledge may follow, the general elements of musical structure and the nature, sources, and varieties of musical effect; and, by the light of that inquiry, to mark out clearly the position of music in relation to the faculties and feelings of the individual, to the other arts, and to society at large.". It is a book which disputants on every side will need attentively to ponder. Psychologically and asshetically—and, we would add, physiologically also—it is a book which makes a distinct forward step."—Spectator, 1ii, 1688.

"The essays collected in these volumes run over a considerable variety of topics,—moral, metaphysical, and establic; but the most cursory examination will show that they are marked throughout by the same predominatingly critical and controversial character. Single-handed Mr. Edmund Gurney encounters one after another such champions as Mr. Frederic Harrison, the author of 'Natural Religion,' Mr. Mallock, Mr. Arthur Balfour, the late Prof. Clifford, Prof. Pollock, Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Alfred Austin, the opponents of 'psychical research,' both parties to the vivisection controversy, the devotees of Wagner, and finally, in defence of his own musical theory, Mr. James Sully and Prof. Stumpf. In each instance he shows perfect knowledge of the subject under discussion, perfect mastery of dialectical fence, perfect good temper and good taste. . . . He has worked out certain views on questions of the day which bring him alternately into conflict with both parties to the dispute. It is this attitude that the title of his book is meant to indicate."—ALFRED W. BENN: Acad., XXXII. 78.
